In order to constitute usury, both parties must be consenting to the unlawful interest, namely: the lender to ask, the borrower to give; and there must be proof of a lending and a borrowing. Price v. Campbell, 1 D. 535.

Therefore, if a bill of exchange be drawn on an obscure man in Scotland, although the payee may expect it will be protested, yet, if there was no agreement between him and the drawer that it should be protested, the transaction is not usurious. Id.

On a question of usury, it is the intention of the parties which determines the nature of the transaction, and no matter what the form, where there is really a loan at more than legal interest, no shift or device can take it out of the statute. The original intention must often be learned by matter dehors the particular instrument of writing between the parties; and what the intention was, whether a real sale or one merely colorable so as to evade the statute, is a question for the jury. Tyson v. Rickard, 5 D. 424.

A stipulation to repay the principal in money is not necessary to constitute a loan; it is enough if the principal is secured, and not bona fide put in hazard, and it matters not what the nature of the security is, if it is insufficient, for if the principal is secured, and more than legal interest is reserved, it is usury. Id.

* See monographic note on usurious contracts, what are, law governing, etc., 55 D. 391-400. See also note, 81 D. 736-738.

A person being indebted to another in a sum upon which usurious interest was paid, it was agreed that a debtor of the former should assume this obligation. Accordingly, this party gave his promissory note to the creditor of the former for the debt, including the usurious interest, the amount of which note was, however, less than his own indebtedness, he paying the balance to his creditor, and being thus released. In an action upon this note, — held, that the transaction was not usurious, the jury finding no intent or contrivance to evade the statute. Bearce v. Barstow, 6 D. 25.

A sale of bank stock, at whatever price, is not usurious, if not intended as a cover for a loan at unlawful interest, and if there be no combination for that purpose between the seller of the stock on credit, and one to whom the purchaser sells it for cash. Greenhow v. Harris, 8 D. 751.

3. Effect of the law of place.* — Usury is not established against a note made another state, by the fact that it bears a higher rate of interest than that allowed by the law of the state where it is sued, unless the note is drawn payable in the latter state, or there is affirmative evidence that the law of the state where it was made prohibits the rate of interest promised. Davis v. Garr, 55 D. 387.

Evasions of usury laws are not countenanced, and when courts detect them, they will withhold any aid to those who make foreign contracts a pretense for exacting usury at home. McAllister v. Smith, 65 D. 651.

A promissory note is controlled, as to defense of usury, by the laws of the state where it is made, dated, and payable, and not by the laws of the state where it is negotiated. Jewell v. Wright, 86 D. 372.

An agreement made in New York to be executed there must be governed by the laws of that state, and if, by those laws, the same would be usurious and void, it will be so held elsewhere. Clague v. Creditors, 20 D. 300.

A contract is not void for usury which is made in Wisconsin with a New York bank, for the payment in Wisconsin to said bank of a sum of money, with interest at ten per cent, though the New York law avoids all contracts which provide for payment of more than seven per cent interest, if the Wisconsin law makes no such provision, — the law of the place of performance governing in determining the validity of the contract. Kennedy v. Knight, 94 D. 543.

The defendant, by a power of attorney, authorized L., "as my agent, to make drafts on me from time to time, as may be necessary for the purchase of lumber on my account, and to consign the same to the care of S. & Co." L. drew drafts in his own name, which the plaintiff discounted upon the faith and possession of the power of attorney. The drafts were drawn and discounted in Canada, but specified no place of payment. In an action upon the draft, — held, that the contract was to be governed by the laws of Canada; and as usury is not a defense there, the plea of usury was not maintainable. Merchants' Bank v. Griswold, 28 R. 159.

A promissory note bearing lawful interest was made in New Brunswick, and secured by mortgage on lands in Maine. After the note was due, illegal interest was exacted for forbearance of payment. By the law of New Brunswick, usurious contracts were void, and the lender forfeited both principal and interest; but in Maine, the rate of interest was not limited. In an action to foreclose the mortgage, — held, that the mortgagor could not avoid the mortgage, as it was valid in its inception; that the statute imposing a forfeiture of the principal and interest was in the nature of a penalty, and of no effect outside of New Brunswick, and that the extra interest paid was not a set-off. Lindsay v. Hill, 22 R. 564.

A, residing in Mississippi, sold cotton to B, a resident of Tennessee, and received therefor the note of B, under seal, dated in Mississippi, but payable in Tennessee to the order of D, a resident of Mississippi, who indorsed it. It was a condition of the sale that the note should be indorsed by the defendant, a resident of Tennessee. The defendant, with knowledge of the facts, indorsed the note in Tennessee, and it was there delivered to A, and by him sold to plaintiff, who was ignorant of the facts. The defendant was the last indorser. The note bore a rate of interest lawful in Mississippi, but not in Tennessee. Held, that the note, so far as related to the defendant, was governed by the laws of Mississippi, and was valid; there was an implied warranty on defendant's part that the note was a valid contract, and executed in a state where the interest demanded was lawful. Overton v. Bolton, 24 R. 367.

Where an agreement for a loan of money is made in New York, and the money there advanced, a note payable in New York, and given as security pursuant to the terms of the agreement, though made in Nebraska, is a mere incident of the agreement, and is governed by the laws of New York; and therefore it may be void by reason of the usury laws of that state, though valid according to the laws of Nebraska. Sands v. Smith, 93 D. 331.

Where a resident of this state makes a note here, dated, payable, and intended to be discounted here, and specifying no rate of interest, and the note is first negotiated in another state, at a rate of interest lawful there, but unlawful here, it is invalid for usury. Dickinson v. Edwards, 33 R. 671.

A bond dated in North Carolina, and specifying no place of payment, although delivered in Virginia, is governed by the usury law of North Carolina. Morris v. Hockaday, 55 R. 607.

Where the borrower resided in Ohio, the laws of which state, at the time, allowed parties to contract for any rate of interest not exceeding ten per cent, and the lender resided in Pennsylvania, where six per cent was the legal rate of interest, on a loan of money made in Ohio, the parties had a right to stipulate in the note for interest at ten per cent per annum, payable semi-annually, and make the note payable in Pennsylvania, without thereby rendering the contract usurious. Kilgore v. Dempsey, 18 R. 306.

In such case, if the borrower, at his option, purchases exchange at a premium, and remits the amount of interest to the place of payment in this form, the premium thus paid for the exchange will not render the contract usurious. Ib.

A note made in Ohio by a citizen of Illinois, specifying no place of payment, but for money to be used in Illinois, at a rate of interest lawful in Illinois, but unlawful in Ohio, is valid in Ohio. Scott v. Pelee, 48 R. 421.

The plaintiff, a Pennsylvania banking corporation, agreed in that state with defendant, a citizen of New York, for the renewal of a note made by the latter and held by the former. The renewal note was made, dated, and payable in New York, and was mailed by the defendant to the plaintiff, with a check for the discount. The discount was at a rate lawful in Pennsylvania, but unlawful in New York. Held, that the note was not usurious in New York. Wayne County Savings Bank v. Low, 37 R. 533.

A note made in South Carolina, payable in North Carolina, securing a mortgage of lands in South Carolina, upon interest lawful in South Carolina, but usurious in North Carolina, is enforceable in South Carolina. Thornton v. Dean, 45 R. 796.

B, a resident of Virginia, took a promissory note made by himself, and indorsed by other residents of Virginia, blank as to date and place of payment, to Maryland, where he inserted a date and place of payment in Maryland, and negotiated it at a rate of interest usurious under the laws of both states. This note was renewed by one made and indorsed by the same parties, which was also usuriously discounted in Maryland. A renewal note for the amount due, made and indorsed, and payable in Virginia, by the same parties, was given for the second note. By the laws of Maryland, usury only avoids a contract as to the excess of interest agreed; by those of Virginia, it invalidates it. Held, 1. In an action on the last note, that th original contract was a Maryland one, and could be enforced there; 2. That the note in suit was but a continuation of the old debt, made with reference to the laws of Maryland, and not being void there, could not be avoided in Virginia. Turpin v. Tucker, 8 Leigh, 93, explained and limited. Bowman v. Miller, 18 R. 686.

4. Devices to cover usury, generally. — A contract, to be usurious, must be substantially a lending and borrowing; and if this be understood, no shift or contrivance will enable the parties to evade the law. Tardeveaux v. Smith, 3 D. 727.

Where two persons exchange notes for the purpose of raising money at an interest exceeding the rate allowed by law, A giving his note to B, and receiving B's note in return, together with a commission greater than the legal interest on the note of A, the transaction is a shift to evade the statute of usury, and B's note is void; and no evidence of a usage of trade will be admitted to avoid the defense. Dunham v. Gould, 8 D. 323.

Covering up a usurious loan by a sale of land at an extravagant price is a device to evade the statute which will not be permitted to avail the lender in equity. Morgan v. Schermerhorn, 19 D. 449.

5. What constitutes usury in respect to bills and notes. — Ten per cent interest in Mississippi is usurious, and an agreement to extend the time of payment of a note on condition that the balance due should bear ten per cent interest is usurious, and the payee forfeits all the interest due, the note being payable in Mississippi. Bruin v. Lowry, 46 D. 545.

A transaction is usurious which provides as a condition to the renewal of an existing loan that new notes, really payable at the same place as the old ones, shall be made payable at another place, so that the lender may exact the difference of exchange in addition to the legal interest. Price v. Lyons Bank, 28 D. 368.

The maker of a note for a certain sum, payable in currency with legal interest, in order to obtain an extension of time gave a new note for the amount, payable in gold coin, or in currency with the premium on gold, at a certain date. Held, that the second note was usurious. Gates v. Hackethal, 11 R. 45.

A promissory note was executed, payable six months after date, with interest, annually, at fifteen per cent from "due until paid." The first six months' interest was paid in advance, and after maturity many installments of interest, at fifteen per cent, were paid, usually every six months in advance, for several years. Held, usurious, and not within the rule allowing a rate of interest exceeding the statutory rate, after maturity, as liquidated damages for non-payment, when inserted with the sole design of securing prompt payment. Sanner v. Smith, 31 R. 70.

A subsequent negotiation of a note upon a usurious consideration cannot defeat action thereon against the maker, if it had a legal inception in the hands of the holder. Catlin v. Gunter, 62 D. 113.

An agreement to pay interest from date of note, if note is not punctually paid at maturity, is not usurious, and may be enforced. Rogers v. Sample, 69 D. 349.

A promissory note is not usurious in its inception, but is binding on the makers, where it is drawn payable to their order, and by them indorsed in blank and delivered to an agent to be discounted for them at the legal rate of interest, and the agent delivered it to a broker to raise money upon it, and the broker pledged it to secure an advance, and afterwards sold it at a usurious rate of discount, applying part of the proceeds to the payment of the advance, and giving the rest to the agent, who converted it, and the transferees in turn sold the note for its full face value to others, innocent of the usurious transaction. Ayer v. Tilden, 77 D. 355.

A reservation in a note that interest thereon shall be payable semi-annually is not usurious. The whole interest may be reserved in advance. Goodrich v. Reynolds, 83 D. 240.

A promissory note is not usurious which stipulates that the principal shall draw more than the legal rate of interest from date, if the note be not paid when due, unless it appears that interest had been included in the face of the note. Fisher v. Anderson, 95 D. 761.

The receiving of interest upon interest is not a violation of the statute of usury; and a note given for interest upon arrears of interest is valid. Stewart v. Petree, 14 R. 352.

Under a statute allowing interest at a specified rate, "upon the amount of such note, payable annually," the reservation of such interest payable semi-annually is not usurious. Cook v. Courtwright, 48 R. 681.

6. — bonds. — An award was made that the defendant should pay to the plaintiff a certain sum; but at the day of payment, not having the money, he agreed with the plaintiff to give more than six per cent for indulgence. A bond was given for the principal sum; and the amount above the legal interest was paid partly in money, and a note given for the balance. Upon an action on the bond, — held, that the transaction was usurious, and the bond void. Gleason v. Newton, 1 D. 559.

7. — commissions, bonuses, etc.* — A party gave another his promissory notes, receiving those of the latter to the same amount in exchange, and a commission of two and a half per cent, which was in excess of the legal interest, for the time the notes had to run. The transaction, — held, to be usurious. Fanning v. Dunham, 9 D. 283.

* Bonuses, when usurious, see notes 55 D. 304, 396; 29 R. 70-75

A contract to pay, as commissions to a commission merchant, two per cent in addition to legal interest, for moneys advanced, is usurious. Stark v. Sperry, 40 R. 47.

Where commission merchants were in the habit of receiving and forwarding to New York produce sent to them by a country merchant, and of accepting his drafts, and charging two and a half per cent commission, in addition to interest, on advances made to meet these drafts, when he had no funds in their hands, — held, that the charge was not usurious, it appearing that it was not a cover for a loan, and that this was the practice of other merchants engaged in similar business. Trotter v. Curtis, 10 D. 211.

To constitute usury, an unlawful or corrupt intent is necessary; a bona fide charge by a banker or broker of a commission for extra trouble or incidental expenses is not usurious. Nourse v. Prime, 11 D. 403.

Where a husband, as agent for loaning his wife's money, takes a commission for himself beyond the rate of legal interest, without his wife's knowledge or consent, the loan is not vitiated for usury. Brigham v. Myers, 33 R. 140.

In consideration of advances by plaintiff, who were cotton factors, defendant agreed to repay the advances with ten per cent interest, and also to ship to plaintiff two hundred bales of cotton, to be sold on commissions, and failing so to do, to pay commissions for every bale deficient. Held, not usurious, and supported by a sufficient consideration. Norwood v. Faulkner, 53 R. 717.

An agreement between a commission merchant and a dealer in produce by which the former is to advance money to the latter, at legal interest, to enable him to buy and carry produce to be sold by the former, and for the care, management, and sale of which the former is also to receive a percentage upon the amount advanced, — held, not usurious in itself, the commission charged not being unusual or unreasonable, and the borrower not being in any strait; and also held, that the fact that the borrower voluntarily took charge of and managed the produce himself did not change the nature of the agreement. Matthews v. Coc, 26 R. 583.

A bonus paid for a loan by a borrower from a banking and building association organized under the Connecticut act of 1850 does not render the loan usurious. West Winsted Savings Ass'n etc. v. Ford, 71 D. 66.

Where an agent intrusted with money to invest at legal interest exacts, without the knowledge or authority of his principal, a bonus for himself, as the condition of making a loan, this will not constitute usury in the principal, or affect the security in his hands. Condit v. Baldwin, 78 D. 137.

8. — discounts. — A debtor on a bond assigned to his creditor other bonds of solvent parties to a much larger amount than his own bond, but at such a discount as left a large part of his own bond still unpaid, and for the balance due he gave a new bond, with sureties, payable at a future day, with legal interest. It was held that the transaction was usurious. Gibson v. Frisbie, 1 D. 502.

Where a bank discounts a note at the usual rate of interest upon condition that the person offering the note for discount shall receive post-notes payable at forty-five, sixty, and ninety days as cash, and the said post-notes are received and paid as cash, the note discounted is usurious. Bank of Elizabeth v. Ayers, 11 D. 535.

When a bank, in its discounts, reserves greater interest than is allowed by its charter, the contract falls within the general usury law. It is not void. The bank may recover the principal sum lent, but without any interest. Planters' Bank v. Sharp, 43 D. 470.

It is not usury for a person to discount commercial paper, and deduct the interest at the time of the discount. Parker v. Cousins, 44 D. 388.

In discounting commercial paper, it is not usurious to reckon the month as thirty days, the year as three hundred and sixty days, and compute the interest at one half of one per cent for thirty days. Ib.

Where it is agreed to renew a note every sixty days for the same amount, upon paying the discount, and upon the renewals every sixty-fourth day is charged for twice, the notes are not usurious. Ib.

A note taken by a bank is void for usury when more than the rate per cent allowed by its charter is taken or reserved. Russell v. Failor, 59 D. 631.

9. — mortgages. — A security made on a good and bona fide consideration cannot be made invalid by reason of a subsequent usurious assignment. Hence, if a mortgage be assigned to a third person, who pays the amount due thereon to the mortgagee, the mortgagor cannot avoid it in the hands of such person on account of an agreement to pay him a sum exceeding the money paid, and legal interest. Bush v. Livingston, 2 D. 316.

A stipulation in a mortgage for the payment of attorney's fees in case of default and a suit in foreclosure is not usurious. Weatherly v. Smith, 6 R. 663.

10. — various other contracts. — A person being indebted in the sum of twelve hundred pounds, payable in four annual installments, in little more than three years, agreed with another that the latter, in consideration of the sum of eight hundred pounds in cash paid by the former, should discharge his debt. This agreement was held usurious and void, notwithstanding the party so agreeing to assume the debt might derive advantage by buying the bonds of the creditor at a discount, or by selling him tobacco at a high price. Watkins v. Taylor, 5 D. 486.

A party borrowed a sum of money from another, and for security pledged a slave, the lender to have the use of the slave for interest. As the value of the slave was greater than legal interest on the sum advanced, the contract was held usurious. Raynolds v. Carter, 37 D. 642.

A bond given to redeem the slave, in such a case, is usurious and void. Ib.

An agreement by a creditor to forbear for one year, after debt is due and payable, in consideration of the debtor's promise to pay twenty per cent interest, is usurious, whether the debtor had or had not previously agreed to pay the creditor whatever interest the creditor might have to pay for other money in consideration of his forbearance to the debtor. Shirley v. Welty, 71 D. 244.

An agreement for a greater rate of interest than that allowed by statute on a pre-existing debt for an extension of the time for its payment is within the statute, and usurious. Ib.

A contract for a consideration exceeding legal interest to forbear enforcing payment of a note, which is not in itself tainted with usury, will not operate to taint the note with usury, but will render the contract void therefor, and the money paid thereon will be applied as a credit on the note. Mallett v. Stone, 85 D. 545.

A usurious loan is none the less usurious because it was made to enable the borrower to take up securities which were not tainted with usury, and such securities were assigned to the usurious lender as collateral. King v. Cushman, 89 D. 366.

Where one intrusts his money to another to loan, and the agent, without the knowledge of his principal, receives unlawful interest or a bonus, which he appropriates to himself, the transaction is usurious. Cheney v. White, 25 R. 487.

A loan made through the lender's agent, the lender understanding that the agent is to charge the borrower for the agent's services in procuring the loan, in addition to lawful interest, and the agent receiving pay therefor accordingly, is usurious. Payne v. Newcomb, 39 R. 69.

Charging interest on monthly balances, according to the custom of a stock-broker, does not constitute usury. Hatch v. Douglas, 40 R. 154.

Stating accounts and calculating interest is not usurious, by parties dealing with commission merchants agreeing that rests shall be made quarterly. Brown v. Vandyke, 55 D. 250.

An agreement to pay a sum of money by a day certain, and more than legal interest afterwards by way of penalty if the debt be not punctually paid, is not usurious. Gower v. Carter, 66 D. 71.

Payment of charges for taxes on a mortgage by the mortgagor under an agreement to that effect, with simple interest on each item from the time it was paid, is not usurious. Banks v. McClellan, 87 D. 594.

A loan is not rendered per se usurious from the fact that the lenders exacted, as a condition of making the loan, that the borrower should secure to them the payment of a subsisting and genuine debt due them from a third person. Valentine v. Conner, 100 D. 476.

A builder contracted to build houses for $54,700, payable in annual installments, to bear interest at 7.30 per cent. The legal rate of interest was six per cent. Held, that if the interest was a part of the contract price of the houses, the contract was not usurious. Græme v. Adams, 14 R. 130.

An agent procuring a loan for his principal, charged and received from him five per cent of the amount and one hundred dollars for going to Chicago and procuring a release of an encumbrance, without the knowledge of the lender or his deriving any benefit therefrom. Held, not usurious. Ballinger v. Bourland, 29 R. 69.

Partners in the banking business agreed that each should be allowed six and one half per cent interest annually on the average amount of his deposits, and should be charged ten per cent on the amount of his overdrafts. Held, not usurious. Payne v. Freer, 43 R. 640.

11. Purchase of negotiable paper for less than full value, when not usurious. — The sale of a promissory note, with the seller's indorsement, at a discount exceeding the lawful rate of interest, is not usurious if made bona fide, and not as a cover for a loan. Lloyd v. Keach, 7 D. 256.

Such a sale being prima facie valid, the burden of proof rests upon the party who claims that it was usurious. Ib.

If a bill be free from usury as between the immediate parties to it, no after transaction with another person can, as respects those parties, invalidate it. So that such a bill may be sold to a purchaser for an amount less than the face and legal interest thereon for the time it has to run, and such purchaser may recover the full amount of the maker or acceptor. Munn v. Commission Co., 8 D. 219.

A bona fide note given for value may be sold in the market for less than its face, without usury. Flemming v. Mulligan, 13 D. 707.

A note sold at a greater discount than the legal interest does not thereby become usurious, if the payee has received it in a business transaction. Ramsey v. Clark, 40 D. 645.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

A sale of negotiable paper at a discount is not usurious, as between the vendor and vendee, where the former is the holder and apparent owner, and represents that the paper belongs to him, and is business paper, although such representation is false, and the paper was in fact made for the sole purpose of sale at a usurious discount, if the vendee purchases bona fide, with no knowledge of such purpose. Holmes v. Williams, 40 D. 250.

The purchase of an accommodation note, at a rate of discount greater than legal interest, if made in good faith, and without knowledge of the character of the paper, is not a usurious transaction, and the defense of usury is not available in an action brought by the purchaser on such note against the maker. Dickerman v. Day, 7 R. 156; Ramsey v. Clark, 40 D. 645.

The promisee in a certain note indorsed it and delivered it to his clerk, with instructions to raise money on it by selling it to the plaintiff as his own property. The clerk sold it to the plaintiff at a discount of thirty-three and one third per cent, representing it as his own, and indorsed it without recourse to himself; and it was held, in an action by the plaintiff against the promisee, as indorser, that the transaction was usurious. Ruffin v. Armstrong, 11 D. 774.

A sale, by an agent employed therefor, for less than its face, of the principal's note, payable to his own order and indorsed by him, is usurious, although the purchaser supposes that he is merely purchasing the note in the market, and does not know that the seller is acting only as an agent. Sylvester v. Swan, 81 D. 734.

Usury laws of the state of New York have no application to a sale of chose in action, and extend only to the loan or forbearance of money. Bailey v. Smith, 84 D. 385.

II. THE DEFENSE OF USURY.

13. The right to set up usury as a defense. — An act of the legislature provided that in an action at law the adverse party may be compelled to answer interrogatories upon oath; and when so answered, they may be used as evidence, as if procured upon a bill in chancery for discovery. Held, that in order to support the defense of usury by such answers, it is not necessary to tender the principal and legal interest. Zeigler v. Scott, 54 D. 395.

Usury or other illegality in an obligation is no defense to a creditor's bill, brought by a judgment creditor to enforce satisfaction of his judgment recovered upon such obligation. The judgment can only be impeached upon a direct proceeding brought to reverse or annul it. Bank of Wooster v. Stevens, 59 D. 619.

The repeal of usury laws takes away the defense of usury in actions thereafter brought on any contract, whether made prior to or after the repeal. Woodruff v. Scruggs, 11 R. 777.

In an action on a promissory note the defendant set up the defense of usury. Held, that the defense was good, although the usury laws had been repealed after the action was brought. Smith v. Glanton, 19 R. 31.

An agreement to withdraw the plea of usury is against public policy, and cannot be enforced; but where a defendant, having once pleaded usury, withdraws the plea in consideration that the plaintiff will consent to a continuance, he ought not to be afterward allowed to amend by filing the same plea again. Clark v. Spencer, 19 R. 96.

13. Who may avail himself of the defense.* — The maker of a promissory note valid in its inception, which has been indorsed for a usurious consideration, may take advantage of the usury in an action by the indorsee. Lloyd v. Keach, 7 D. 256.

Where a person, for the purpose of raising money, agrees with another to procure a note signed and indorsed by other parties, but not by himself, which the lender agrees to discount at usurious interest, and such note is accordingly obtained and discounted, an indorser thereon may resist payment on the ground of usury. Warren v. Crabtree, 10 D. 51.

The defense of usury is personal to the borrower and his heirs or representatives. Stephens v. Muir, 65 D. 764; Stein v. Indianapolis Building etc. Ass'n, 81 D. 353; Lee v. Feamster, 45 R. 549.

Usury, it seems, may be set up by a vendee of real estate subject to a usurious mortgage, with consent of the party who made the usurious contract and who was to suffer by it; and if such person be made a party to the action, he may urge usury as a ground of equitable relief to himself. Stephens v. Muir, 65 D. 764.

Where an agent for loaning money takes a security in his own name as principal, upon usurious interest, the borrower, supposing him the principal, may plead usury. Brickson v. Bell, 36 R. 246.

14. Who may not. — A purchaser of real estate subject to a mortgage tainted with usury cannot set up the usury against a bill for foreclosure. Stephens v. Muir, 65 D. 764; Stein v. Indianapolis Building etc. Ass'n, 81 D. 353.

Interest on a usurious contract may be recovered, unless the party affected by the usury sets up the usury in his answer, and tenders the principal sum. Rock River Bank v. Sherwood, 78 D. 669.

A borrower who has not agreed to pay usurious interest cannot maintain the defense of usury to an action to recover the money loaned, on the ground that a third person has paid the usury demanded by the lender for making the loan. McArthur v. Schenck, 11 R. 643.

* That the defense of usury is personal, see note, 55 D. 398-400.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

Where one purchases land subject to a mortgage lien, and, as a part of the consideration, agrees to pay the mortgage debt, he cannot defend against the mortgage on the ground of usury. Cramer v. Lepper, 20 R. 756.

The plea of usury is a personal privilege, and if the debtor declines to avail himself of it, no stranger to the transaction can; therefore a second mortgagee cannot plead usury in a prior mortgage either to defeat or postpone its lien. Pritchett v. Mitchell, 22 R. 287; Ready v. Huebner, 32 R. 749.

A purchaser at a sale by an assignee in bankruptcy, of land subject to a mortgage of which he has notice, cannot set up usury against the mortgage. Nance v. Gregory, 40 R. 41.

One who borrows money on a mortgage, covenanting that it is a valid lien, wholly unpaid, and subject to no defense, is estopped, as are also his privies, from setting up the defense of usury against it. Union Dime Savings Inst. v. Wilnot, 46 R. 137.

The defense of usury, being unavailing to a corporation in New York, cannot be invoked by its surety. Freese v. Brownell, 10 R. 239.

A surety cannot avail himself of usurious interest paid by his principal on a non-negotiable note, after the execution of the note in reduction thereof. Lamoille Co. Nat. Bank v. Bingham, 28 R. 490.

A surety who has given his own note in part payment of his principal's usurious note cannot plead usury in an action upon his own note. Culver v. Wilbern, 30 R. 385.

15. Pleading usury as a defense. — Usury is clearly admissible under the plea of non assumpsit, because the effect of such evidence is to prove that the promise was not obligatory, but void ab initio. Solomons v. Jones, 5 D. 538.

Where, by statute, the taking of usury does not avoid the contract, but only forfeits the interest, the defense of usury is not admissible under the plea of non assumpsit, but must be pleaded specially and proved strictly as averred. Frank v. Morris, 11 R. 4.

In real actions, under the general issue of nil disseisin, a subsequent purchaser may give evidence of usury, to avoid a prior conveyance from his grantor. Hills v. Eliot, 7 D. 26.

A plea of usury is defective if it do not allege a corrupt agreement upon the part of the lender to take more interest than the law allows. McFarland v. State Bank, 37 D. 761.

16. Evidence. — Evidence of the amount paid for the hire of a negro is admissible, if it tend to throw light upon an alleged usurious transaction, by showing that the principal and interest of the original debt had been paid by the hirer. Greer v. Caldwell, 58 D. 553.

III. EFFECT OF USURY.

17. Upon securities, generally. — A contract reserving a rate of interest higher than that allowed by law is not void; the obligee may recover the principal sum, with the legal rate of interest. Bank of Chillicothe v. Swayne, 32 D. 707.

If a usurious note is given for a valid pre-existing debt, it will not cancel the pre-existing debt; that will remain unsatisfied by the nugatory and void security, and the creditor will be remitted to his original title thereto and remedy therefor. Parker v. Cousins, 44 D. 388.

The reservation of an illegal rate of interest does not prevent recovery of the principal and legal interest thereon. Philadelphia & S. R. R. Co. v. Lewis, 75 D. 574.

If usurious interest is taken out in advance, it makes a case of want of consideration, in a note covering the amount, to the extent of such interest. Musselman v. McElhenny, 85 D. 445.

A promise made in a note to pay usurious interest in future is a promise, to that extent, without consideration. Ib.

Plaintiff advanced money to pay a mortgage, taking another mortgage to secure the advance. The second mortgage was declared void for usury. Held, that the usury did not affect the first mortgage, and the second mortgage being void, the prior mortgage revived and could be enforced by plaintiff. Patterson v. Birdsall, 21 R. 609.

A valid obligation is not invalidated by a usurious agreement for the extension of the time of payment, but the sum paid for forbearance will be applied as payment. Real Estate Trust Co. v. Keech, 25 R. 181.

18. Upon renewals and new securities. — Usury in a transaction avoids all subsequent securities growing out of it. Price v. Lyons Bank, 88 D. 368.

A promissory note was given in payment of a debt, the promisor agreeing to pay a usurious rate of interest. After sundry payments of interest at the rate agreed, and of part of the principal, a new note was given for the balance of the principal due, on which lawful interest only was reserved or taken. This note, being in part paid, was also canceled, and a third note given for the balance. In an action by the indorsee of the latter note against the promisor, — held, not to be tainted with the usurious interest paid on the first note. Chadbourn v. Watts, 6 D. 100.

Where a security was originally void for usury, another security substituted therefor is still affected by the original usury, and a holder cannot recover thereon, it not appearing that he was or was not a bona fide purchaser, or had knowledge of the transaction. Bridge v. Hubbard, 8 D. 86.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

A new security, including a sum for unlawful unpaid interest, is so far without consideration, and liable to abatement to that extent. Smith v. Stoddard, 81 D. 778.

A person gave a note for five hundred dollars, for a valuable consideration, payable in sixty days, and when it fell due, to obtain a further time of sixty days, he gave his due-bill for fifty dollars, and a renewed note for five hundred dollars, payable sixty days after date. The transaction was held usurious, and the note for five hundred dollars, as well as that for fifty dollars, was void. Motte v. Dorrell, 10 D. 675.

Where, upon the renewal of a note, a premium above seven per cent is exacted, the new note is usurious, although a separate note is given for the premium. Swartwout v. Payne, 10 D. 228.

A usurious note given in renewal of a former valid one does not affect the antecedent debt. Ib.

Where a note is given on a usurious contract, and partly paid, and a new note given for the balance, such new note is also usurious. Warren v. Crabtree, 10 D. 51.

A new note given between the original parties, for part or all of a usurious note, is itself usurious and void; but a note taken in renewal of such usurious note by an innocent indorsee is valid. Flemming v. Mulligan, 13 D. 707.

If a usurious security be given up, and a new security taken for the sum advanced and legal interest, the latter security will be good; for the borrower's moral obligation to pay the principal and legal interest is a sufficient consideration therefor. Kilbourn v. Bradley, 3 D. 273.

Where one pays part of a usurious note, and gives a new note for the residue, the new note will not be infected by the usury. Bank of Elizabeth v. Ayers, 11 D. 535.

19. Effect of subsequent agreement to cure prior usurious one. — Where a judgment entered on a bond and warrant of attorney given as security for a usurious loan was set aside without declaring the bond void, and the defendant afterwards promised to pay the sum actually lent, — held, that this promise was valid, and would support an action of assumpsit, and that the plaintiff would be entitled to judgment thereon on bringing in the usurious securities for cancellation. Early v. Mahon, 10 D. 204.

The taint of usury is purged by change of parties in a case where a bond executed by three persons for a loan of money at usurious interest is subsequently superseded by a new bond for the amount of the former bond, principal and interest, which new bond is signed by two persons, strangers to the former bond, as principals, and by one of the former obligors, as surety. Drake v. Chandler, 93 D. 762.

20. Rights of innocent purchasers. — If a promissory note is given for a usurious contract, it is absolutely void, even in the hands of an innocent holder, who has received it in the fair and regular course of trade, without knowledge of the usury. Willie v. Roosevelt, 2 D. 149; Solomons v. Jones, 5 D. 538; Flemming v. Mulligan, 13 D. 707; Ayer v. Tilden, 77 D. 355.

A defendant, being charged as indorser upon a promissory note, gave his own note in lieu thereof. The original note was void for usury, but defendant was ignorant of this fact when he gave his note in renewal. Held, that defendant could defend for usury against a bona fide purchaser of his own note for value. First Nat. Bank v. Plankinton, 9 R. 453.

A bona fide purchaser, without notice, under a sale made by virtue of a power of attorney contained in a mortgage, is not affected by usury in the original contract. Jackson v. Henry, 6 D. 328.

The defense of usury to a note given for a usurious consideration is cut off by an indorsement thereof before maturity to a bona fide purchaser without notice. Woodworth v. Huntoon, 89 D. 340.

Though the statute against usury declares the usurious contract and security utterly void, yet this is only between the original parties on the instrument infected with usury. Where the original usurious contract has been changed by a new contract founded on it, in which an innocent person is a party, the defense of usury cannot be set up against such innocent purchaser. Jackson v. Henry, 6 D. 328.

Where the holder of a note, knowing it to be usurious, transfers it to another as part of the consideration for a purchase of land, with the assurance that it is good and valid, the transferee, upon failing to recover on the note on account of the usury, may treat it as a nullity, and bring assumpsit against the purchaser of the land for the consideration. Swartwout v. Payne, 10 D. 228.

21. — of third persons. — A usurious bond is void in the hands of a third person, not an assignee for value, without notice. Raynolds v. Carter, 37 D. 642.

IV. REMEDIES.

22. Recovering back usury at law. — One who has paid more than the legal rate of interest may recover the excess in an action of assumpsit, and is not limited to the remedy prescribed by the statute to prevent usury. But to entitle the plaintiff to recover, he must show that he has done all that equity requires. Wheaton v. Hibbard, 11 D. 284.

If a borrower pays up the amount of a usurious debt to the lender, and afterwards sues to recover it back in an action for money had and received, he can only recover the usurious excess, and no more. Zeigler v. Scott, 54 D. 395.

The form of action in assumpsit to recover back usury, given by the statute to the party who has paid it, is no less a mode of redressing an injury caused by personal wrong and oppression, than if the action sounded wholly in tort. Nichols v. Bellows, 54 D. 85.

The right to sue for usury paid by a bankrupt does not vest in his assignee. Ib.

The payment of usury on a note operates in law as part payment of the note, where the security on which the payment is made includes both the loan and the stipulated usury. But when separate securities are given for the usury, whether at the time of the negotiation of the loan or afterwards, and the usury, when paid, is applied on such securities, the debtor is at liberty to treat such a payment as having no connection with the legal demand, and bring his action to recover it back. Ib.

A mortgagor cannot maintain an action to recover usurious interest, collected by sale of the mortgaged premises under a power of sale contained in the mortgage deed; and the fact that the execution of the power was against the wishes of the debtor at the time does not aid him. Perkins v. Conant, 81 D. 305.

Where usurious interest is paid on a note after its execution, it amounts to a payment of so much on the principal; and if the amount thus paid exceeds the principal, it may be recovered back. Musselman v. McElhenry, 85 D. 445.

23. When relief will be granted in equity.—A party seeking equitable relief from a usurious contract will not be entitled to an injunction against proceedings at law, or to an answer, until he pays or tenders the amount actually borrowed. Morgan v. Schermerhorn, 19 D. 449.

An injunction already granted will not be dissolved in such a case, if an answer is put in without objection, if usury appears, and the complainant is still willing to pay what is really due. Ib.

The payment of usury by the maker of a note to a bona fide indorsee thereof before maturity is regarded as an involuntary payment, since his defense of usury is cut off, and he may recover it back from the payee of the note by a suit in equity; and it seems that the maker has a remedy at law. Woodworth v. Huntoon, 89 D. 340.

24. When relief will be refused.—Plaintiff purchased real estate subject to a mortgage and, as part of the consideration, agreed to pay the mortgage debt. Held, that plaintiff could not maintain a bill in equity to restrain a sale of the premises by the mortgagee under a power in the mortgage, on the ground that the mortgage debt was usurious. Hough v. Horsey, 11 R. 484.

25. Pleading.—An excess of interest paid under a usurious contract may be applied in payment of interest afterward accruing, where usury is pleaded and proved, but forfeiture of the loan is not prayed for. Lockwood v. Mitchell, 70 D. 78.

26. The relief granted.—A bill was filed to stay proceedings upon a usurious deed of trust, on the ground that the complainant had no opportunity at law to plead the usury, but he prayed for no discovery, but, on the contrary, averred he had proof of the fact. It was held that he ought not to be relieved upon the condition of his paying the principal without interest, but that the trustee should be altogether enjoined from selling, until by some proper proceeding, taken by the cestui que trust, the validity of the contract could be established, when the injunction should be dissolved, but if not established, perpetuated. Marks v. Morris, 5 D. 481.

When the lender on a usurious contract seeks the aid of equity to enforce the contract, and the borrower pleads and proves usury, the security will be declared void, and ordered to be given up and canceled. But where there has been a judgment at law in favor of the lender, and the borrower files his bill for relief against the judgment, he must offer to pay the principal and interest lawfully due. Fanning v. Dunham, 9 D. 283.

Relief upon a usurious contract at law or equity, when sought by the borrower, will be administered only as to the surplus above the principal and lawful interest. Baughner v. Nelson, 52 D. 694.

A borrower is always under moral obligation to pay the sum loaned, with legal interest thereon. Ib.

Such moral obligation of the borrower cannot be enforced by courts when he is before them in the position of defendant. Ib.

Usury is a personal defense; and when set up against a subsequent purchaser, only the amount of illegal interest is to be deducted from the conditional judgment for the amount due on a mortgage. Ladd v. Wiggin, 69 D. 551.

Where a suit impeaching a mortgage debt for usury is dismissed under an unauthorized contract, and in prejudice of an insane mortgagor's rights, there being in fact usury in the transaction, the trustees of the lunatic, upon being required to account to the mortgagor for the principal and interest, are entitled to a credit of all excess of interest paid beyond the lawful rate. Lockwood v. Mitchell, 70 D. 78.

The right of a borrower to insist upon a forfeiture by the lender of the whole interest, though a legal right, is not to the full extent an equitable one. If the borrower goes into equity in respect to a usurious contract, he will be compelled to pay the principal and legal interest, because there is a moral obligation resting upon him to do so. Welch v. Wadsworth, 79 D. 236.

A deduction for unlawful interest actually paid will not be allowed, in favor of a debtor, when suit is brought on a new security taken for the principal, and given upon a bona fide settlement of all the former transactions between the parties. Smith v. Stoddard, 81 D. 778.

A plaintiff may recover interest on a usurious contract up to the highest legal rate not prohibited by the statute, if such be the express terms of the contract. Ib.

27. Penalties for usury. — Parties to usurious contracts hold any right they may have to penalties given by law, subject to a modification or repeal by the legislature, and a consequent direct or indirect validation of the contracts. Welch v. Wadsworth, 79 D. 236.

Usury does not subject to penalties or forfeitures in Indiana, since 1863. Musselman v. McElhenny, 85 D. 445.

Penalties imposed by the usury laws of one state are not recoverable in another. Blaine v. Curtis, 59 R. 702.

I. CONTRACTS FOR THE SALE OF LAND.

1. Validity and Requisites, Generally; and Herein of the Statute of Frauds.

1. Distinction between contract to sell, and deed or other conveyance. — An instrument in writing, signed and sealed by the owner of land, with blanks as to the name of the bargainee, and left with an agent authorized by parol to fill the blanks with the name of the purchaser, and the price, though ineffectual as a deed, may be specifically enforced as a contract for the sale of land, signed for the person to be charged therewith by his lawfully authorized agent. Blacknall v. Parish, 78 D. 239.

2. Necessity and sufficiency of the consideration. — Certainty as to the consideration of an agreement for the sale of land is sufficient, where it is stated therein that the premises were previously purchased by the vendor from the vendee, and the consideration is expressed to be "the same sum" which the vendor paid for the same, with interest. Atwood v. Cobb, 26 D. 657.

A contract for the sale of lands is void for want of consideration, where nothing is paid or agreed to be paid therefor by the party with whom the contract is made. Bean v. Burbank, 33 D. 681.

The consideration of such a contract need not be recited in the instrument, but it must exist in fact, and proof of it is essential to the legal enforcement of the contract. Ib.

A stipulation in a contract of sale of land to repay purchase-money at a specified time, if the vendee desires it, is not void for want of consideration; for the purchase and payment of the price furnish a sufficient consideration. Ebo v. Woodworth, 53 D. 370.

Such a stipulation is not void for want of mutuality, even though it does in terms require that the vendee, on demanding repayment of the price, will return the property; a condition to that effect will be implied; or a return may be enforced in equity. Ib.

3. Validity of the contract, generally. — Where the vendor of lands thinks he is selling one parcel, and the vendee thinks he is purchasing another parcel, their minds do not agree, and there is no contract, although both parties acted in good faith. Kyle v. Kavanagh, 4 R. 560.

4. Validity of oral agreement to convey. — Where the statute of frauds enacted in a state omitted the English provision that no action should be brought to recover damages on any contract for the sale of land, unless the agreement shall be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or by some other person by him lawfully authorized, — held, that a parol contract for the sale of land was valid, so as to support an action for damages, though made with an agent who had merely parol authority. Ewing v. Tess, 2 D. 455.

A verbal contract to convey land made prior to the statute of frauds is valid. Allen v. Beal, 13 D. 203.

The Pennsylvania statute of frauds does not apply to parol contracts for sale of lands in another state, and does not avoid such contracts, though made in Pennsylvania. Siegel v. Robinson, 93 D. 775.

A contract for the sale of land must be in writing, under the Mexican law. Hoen v. Simmons, 52 D. 291.

In parol sales of land, all evidence of verbal contract will be rejected, if being taken as true it does not make out such a case as to entitle it to stand as an exception to the statute of frauds. Poorman v. Kilgore, 67 D. 425; Marcy v. Stone, 54 D. 736; or unless there has been such a part performance as cannot be compensated in damages. McKown v. McDonald, 82 D. 576; White v. Beard, 30 D. 552.

Contracts by parol for land are generally regarded as voidable merely. Sims v. Hutchins, 47 D. 90. And if such an agreement is subsequently carried out in good faith, the grantee's title cannot be affected by a judgment against the grantor, which was rendered after the making of the agreement, and before the execution of the conveyance, in performance thereof. Minns v. Morse, 45 D. 590.

A verbal sale of land may be sustained by the vendor's oath in favor of the vendee. Houser v. Lamont, 93 D. 755.

An oral agreement by the vendee of land to reconvey it is within the statute of frauds; and where it appears in a bill for specific performance that the agreement was oral, the fact can be taken advantage of by demurrer. Akrend v. Odiorne, 19 R. 449.

5. What is an interest in lands, within the purview of the statute of frauds. — When a contract comprehends an interest in trees standing, with a right in the vendee to sever them, the subject-matter is then an interest in land within the statute of frauds. Slocum v. Seymour, 13 R. 432; Owens v. Lewis, 15 R. 295.

A sale of a crop of peaches then growing in the seller's orchard, the buyer to gather and remove the peaches as they mature, — held, not within the statute of frauds as a sale of an interest in land. Purner v. Piercy, 17 R. 591.

6. What contracts respecting lands are within the statute. — Where lands are sold and conveyed by deed describing the metes and bounds, lines, and supposed quantity, a parol agreement, at the same time, to pay the grantee for all that it shall fall short on measurement is void, being within the statute of frauds. Bradley v. Blodget, 1 D. 11.

A contract for sale of lands need not be under seal, under the statute of frauds. Worrall v. Muan, 55 D. 330.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

The statute of frauds has no application to the enforcement of a penalty for not completing the contract of sale of land agreed upon, by making a bid at an execution sale. Lockridge v. Baldwin, 70 D. 385.

A parol agreement is within the statute of frauds, and cannot be enforced, unless it has been partly performed, where it is to convey land to the plaintiff when he should pay the defendant the purchase price the latter had paid for it. Wentworth v. Wentworth, 72 D. 97.

An oral agreement by A with B to pay for land to be deeded by him to C is void, although B deeds the land accordingly. Liddle v. Needham, 33 R. 359.

An agreement whereby the lands of defendant should be sold to other persons at an improved value, to be caused by the complainant's exertions, and after sales were so made, that the complainant should receive one half of the proceeds, he first paying the price agreed on by the parties, and performing the acts agreed to be done by him to entitle him to his share of the proceeds, is not a contract for the sale of land, and need not be in writing. Lesley v. Rosson, 77 D. 679.

A verbal agreement to rescind a contract under seal for the sale of land, made after payments are due, and founded upon no new consideration, unless followed by an actual abandonment of the sale by both parties, and a restoration of the property, so far as possible, to the vendor, will be treated as invalid in a suit by the vendor for the stipulated purchase-money. Pratt v. Morrow, 100 D. 381.

An oral agreement between two parties to become jointly purchasers of certain lands, and to hold the same in undivided moieties, is within the statute of frauds. Green v. Drummond, 1 R. 14.

Where, in pursuance of such an agreement, a purchase was made in the name of D. alone, although G. advanced a portion of the purchase-money, a conventional trust that could be enforced was not created, the same being within the provisions of the seventh section. Ib.

There being no deed or conveyance of the legal title to D., while the contract of purchase remained executory, no resulting trust within the meaning of the eighth section of the statute could arise in favor of G. Ib.

A mutual transfer of possession of lands, under a parol contract, which continues exclusive and undisturbed for nineteen years, is a valid transfer of titles, and is not within the statute of frauds. Moss v. Culver, 3 R. 601.

A and B mutually agreed by parol that each should make a will of her real and personal estate in favor of the other, and the wills were so made, but B afterward made another will, in favor of other parties, and died. Held, that the agreement was a contract for the sale of lands within the statute of frauds, and therefore void. Gould v. Mansfield, 4 R. 573.

7. Form and execution of the memorandum. — A memorandum of a contract for the sale of land signed by the vendor alone is sufficient, under the statute of frauds, to enable the vendee to enforce it; his own assent to the contract being provable by evidence aliunde. Ives v. Hazard, 67 D. 500; Worrall v. Munn, 55 D. 330; McCrea v. Purmort, 30 D. 103; Gartrell v. Stafford, 41 R. 767.

A memorandum reading "I agree to sell," signed by vendor, describing the land, expressing the consideration and the time of payment and of giving possession, imports an agreement of sale, and not a mere offer to sell, and is sufficient as against the vendor, under the statute of frauds. Ives v. Hazard, 67 D. 500.

A contract is not invalid because of the omission of the word "dollars," in an offer to sell "forty acres of land for ten per acre," which was accepted, the purchaser agreeing to pay "what you ask,—four hundred dollars,"—there being no possibility of doubt as to its meaning. Northwestern I. Co. v. Meade, 94 D. 557.

The acceptance of an offer to sell land, but fixing a different place for the delivery of the deed and payment of the money than the residence of the respective parties or the place named in the offer, is not an unconditional acceptance so as to bind the seller. Ib.

A contracted with B for the sale of a lot of land, the only written evidence of the contract being several receipts, signed by A and his agent, acknowledging the receipt of certain sums of money from B "in part payment for a house and lot," without describing the premises, or furnishing any data for ascertaining their locality. Held, that said writings were insufficient to take the case out of the statute of frauds, and that part performance of the agreement was also insufficient. McGuire v. Stevens, 2 R. 649.

A mere receipt for money on account of a purchase of land, and a letter from the purchaser, referring only generally to an existing contract, do not constitute a valid contract within the statute of frauds. Smith v. Jones, 42 R. 72.

8. Sufficiency of the memorandum. — 1. What is sufficient. — Where a statute of frauds provided that "no person shall be charged on any promise, etc., unless the agreement on which such action shall be brought, or some note or memorandum thereof shall be in writing,"—held, that an agreement relating to the sale of lands must have the consideration for the promise, as well as the promise itself, in writing. Sears v. Brink, 3 D. 475.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume L.

On the sale of land the following receipt was held sufficient as a memorandum within the statute of frauds: "Received of C. twenty dollars, being on account of a plantation on the Cypress, sold to him this day, for two thousand two hundred dollars, payable in different installments, as per agreement." Cosack v. Descoudres, 10 D. 681.

A deed executed by defendant is a sufficient memorandum under the statute of frauds, though not delivered, to support a decree for specific performance of a contract to exchange lands. Parrill v. McKinley, 58 D. 212.

The memorandum need not set forth the whole contract, but the substance only, to satisfy the statute of frauds; and where, in a contract for the sale of land, there was a stipulation that the purchaser was to pay certain annuities charged thereon, the omission of such stipulation from the memorandum signed by the vendor, where the purchaser in his bill admits it and avers his readiness to pay the annuities, is no bar to specific performance. Ives v. Hazard, 67 D. 500.

The memorandum need not show a consideration already paid, to be good under the statute of frauds. Ib.

The memorandum required by the statute of frauds to maintain an action on the contract for the sale of any interest in land must clearly show, either by itself or taken in connection with some other writing contemporaneous with or referred to in the memorandum, what that interest is. Farwell v. Mather, 87 D. 641.

A memorandum required by the statute of frauds may be interpreted by resort to oral evidence. The court may ascertain by such evidence the relations of the parties to any property which will satisfy the terms of the memorandum, but the writing, whether consisting of one paper or several, must describe or identify the subject of the contract. Ib.

The requirement of the statute of frauds of a written memorial of a contract for sale of land is satisfied by a receipt for money "for land" shown to be the land in contest, strengthened by the admissions of the personal representatives of the party to be charged as to his liability and duty. Miller v. Antle, 92 D. 495.

A memorandum describes property with sufficient certainty to satisfy the statute of frauds, and to enable the contract to be specifically performed, where it is of "a house and lot of land situated on Amity Street, Lynn, Mass."; and parol evidence is admissible to apply the description to a house and lot on such street, owned by the vendor at the time the memorandum was signed. Hurley v. Brown, 96 D. 671.

Neither party can contend that there is no memorandum in writing signed by the party to be charged when a written instrument exists which is evidence of a contract for a mutual exchange of lands in presenti, and though not enforceable in itself unaided by extraneous evidence for want of certainty in specifying what lands were exchanged by the parties, is made certain by the subsequent acts of the parties in taking possession and consummating the exchange. The vendee in possession cannot set up such defense, more especially when the vendor is able and willing to convey. Overstreet v. Rice, 96 D. 279.

In a written contract to convey real estate, the words "a house on Church Street" are a sufficient description of the estate to satisfy the requirements of the statute of frauds; and the house may be identified by parol evidence. Mead v. Parker, 15 R. 110.

A defendant executed to plaintiff a negotiable instrument, which stated that the consideration was land sold him by plaintiff. In a suit upon that instrument, — held, 1. That the suit was on the note, and not on the contract of sale of the land; 2. That, as a memorandum of the sale, it did not need to be signed by the vendor; 3. That it was enforceable as a note, although it might not be a sufficient memorandum under the statute of frauds. Crutchfield v. Donathon, 30 R. 112.

A draft for the purchase-money of lands, drawn by an agent without disclosing his principal's name, is a sufficient memorandum under the statute of frauds. Neaves v. North State Mining Co., 47 R. 529.

2. What is not. — Where deeds were drawn, and the vendor took them home and wrote to the vendee that the deeds were ready, and requested her to attend and settle the business, but he died before the parties met, — held, not to be such an agreement in writing as will take the case out of the statute of frauds, as the letter did not distinctly set forth the terms of the agreement, or refer to a written instrument in which they are set forth, and that the party accepted such terms. Givens v. Calder, 2 D. 686.

A written memorandum of an agreement for the sale of lands is not sufficient, within the meaning of the statute of frauds, unless it discloses the terms of the contract and the parties thereto. Sherburne v. Shaw, 8 D. 47.

A memorandum of a contract for sale of an interest in lands which consisted merely of an invoice commencing with the words, "Invoice of articles purchased by S. Pipkin and R. Oliver of Wm. R. James, this twenty-ninth August, 1836," and after specifying numerous articles, concluding with the words, "One ice-house and lot, $140," is not a sufficient memorandum, within the statute of frauds, to bind the purchaser in respect to the real property, and he may recover the purchase-money paid thereon. Pipkin v. James, 34 D. 652.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

A deed of land signed by a vendor, and kept in his possession without delivery to the vendee, is not a sufficient memorandum of the contract to satisfy the statute of frauds. Johnson v. Brook, 66 D. 547.

Where a husband and wife agree to convey their interest in a tract of land, a deed thereof executed by the husband alone is not a complete memorandum of the contract, and is insufficient under the statute of frauds. Ib.

A memorandum in writing agreeing to give a certain sum "for the whole property, from cellar to top, including lease, press, boiler and engine, type, fixtures, furniture," etc., and to pay a certain sum quarterly until the principal and interest are paid, and "in addition pay over the $1,215 to be received from P., and the proceeds and goodwill of the Times, all of which sums shall be deducted from" the gross sum to be paid, is not sufficient to take the contract out of the statute of frauds. Farwell v. Mather, 87 D. 641.

No action upon such a contract can be supported by the addition of oral proof that the memorandum was intended to apply to an unexpired lease of a certain building, subject to a certain ground-rent, in which building the press and other articles were situated and the Times newspaper was printed; that P. had agreed and bargained with the vendor, in consideration of $1,215, for a release and conveyance of a small portion of the land included in said lease; and that there was no other building anywhere owned or held by the vendor under a lease to which the description would apply. Ib.

Telegrams signed by the vendee of real estate are insufficient to constitute a memorandum under statute of frauds, where they do not describe, mention, or refer to the subject-matter of the contract otherwise than by showing the terms of part payment, and directing the agents of the vendor to draw up a contract accordingly. Hazard v. Day, 92 D. 790.

A letter written by an owner of real estate to his agent, and received by him, stating that he would sell a certain portion thereof at a certain price, is not an agreement under the statute of frauds, although the agent communicates its contents to a proposed purchaser, who orally agrees to purchase upon the specified terms. Steel v. Rife, 30 R. 388.

9. What performance or payment will take the case out of the operation of the statute. — Payment of a substantial part of the purchase-money in the execution of a parol agreement for the sale of lands is such a part performance as will take the case out of the statute of frauds, and will warrant a specific performance. Townsend v. Houston, 27 D. 732. But such payment must be clearly made in execution of the contract. Houston v. Townsend, 12 D. 109.

Part performance may be proved, generally, by parol; but the payment of money being an equivocal act, the fact that it was paid in execution of the contract must either be admitted or proved by writing. Ib.

The terms of the contract may be proved by parol, the fact of a part performance having been first established. Ib.

A promise to pay for land actually conveyed need not be in writing. Whitbeck v. Whitbeck, 18 D. 503.

Suit may be brought on a parol contract for the sale of lands, after the same has been fully executed, and nothing remains to be done except to pay over the purchase price. Linscott v. McIntire, 33 D. 602.

A contract relating to lands partly executed by one of the parties may be proved by parol, and specific performance decreed, in order that one side may not take advantage of the other. Townsend v. Houston, 27 D. 732.

The court must be able to ascertain the terms of an agreement partly performed, in order to warrant a specific performance. Ib.

Equity decides upon equitable grounds in contradiction to the positive enactments of the statute of frauds, and in case of part performance will admit parol testimony to prove a parol contract relative to land. Ib.

The act relied upon as a part performance should be such as would not have been done independent of some agreement or contract relative to land. Ib.

The act must, to a certain extent, be a joint act, or such as clearly indicates a mutual assent. Ib.

The distinguishing principle is, that the part performance must be something done in the execution of the agreement, and not as preparatory or as an inducement. Ib.

The receipt of the purchase-money by the vendor, proved by writing, is a part execution of a contract for the sale of land. Ib.

If upon a parol sale of land a note for the price be given, and before the note is paid, or an action brought, a conveyance be made and executed, the purchaser cannot rely upon the want of a writing evidencing the original sale, to defeat an action upon the note. Edelin v. Clarkson, 38 D. 177.

A parol contract for the sale of lands of which possession is to be given before payment made, and the possession is thereafter accordingly given to the vendee, is sufficiently executed thereby to estop the vendee from setting up a failure of consideration to an action upon a note given for the price. Ib.

A part performance of a verbal contract for sale of land takes the contract or sale out of the statute of frauds. Maddox v. Rowe, 68 D. 535; and warrants specific enforcement where there has been delivery with acts of ownership on both sides. Parrill v. McKinley, 58 D. 212.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

Though the fourth section of the statute of frauds of England, upon which the doctrine of the effect of part performance of a parol contract for the sale of lands is founded, is omitted from the statute as enacted in the state of Pennsylvania, yet that doctrine as declared by the courts of chancery in England is recognized as a part of the law of that state. Pugh v. Good, 37 D. 534.

10. What will not do so. — Part performance of a parol contract for sale of land does not take it out of the statute of frauds. Box v. Stanford, 51 D. 142; nor entitle either party to sustain an action at law for damages suffered from non-performance of the residue. Norton v. Preston, 32 D. 128.

Payment of purchase-money is not alone sufficient to take a parol contract for the sale of land out of the statute of frauds. Gangwer v. Fry, 55 D. 578. There must also be a distinct and notorious transmission of the possession from one party to the other. Myers v. Byerly, 84 D. 497.

Payment of a part or the whole of the purchase price is insufficient to take a contract out of the statute of frauds. Allen v. Booker, 19 D. 33; Johnston v. Glancy, 28 D. 45; Blanchard v. McDougal, 70 D. 458; Pinnock v. Clough, 42 D. 521; Baldwin v. Palmer, 61 D. 743; Poland v. O'Connor, 93 D. 327.

A refusal by a vendor to execute a parol agreement of sale of real estate is not a fraud taking the case out of the statute of frauds, where the purchaser has paid no portion of the purchase-money, made no lasting and valuable improvements, and has not been let into possession. Bowen v. Rowe, 83 D. 184.

Plaintiff and defendant made an oral contract for the sale of property by the plaintiff to the defendant, and each deposited a sum of money with a third party, to be paid by him to either, in case the other should fail to fulfill his part of the contract. Held, that the deposit was not an "earnest" within the statute of frauds. Howe v. Hayward, 11 R. 306.

The person contracting to purchase, having deposited part of the purchase-money with her agent to pay the vendor as soon as he executed the deed, and the agent informing the vendor of it, is not such a performance as takes the case out of the statute; nor does the purchaser taking possession of the land, without any known permission of the vendor, make such a part performance. Givens v. Calder, 2 D. 686.

On a parol contract for the sale of lands, the fact that it formed a part of the agreement itself, that it should be reduced to writing, and that the defendant fraudulently evaded this part of the contract, is not sufficient to take the case out of the statute of frauds. Box v. Stanford, 51 D. 142.

The doctrine of part performance is not to be extended to new cases which do not come clearly within the rules and precedents already established. The statute of frauds should not be further encroached upon. Gangwer v. Fry, 55 D. 578.

Part performance of a parol contract is allowed by a court of equity to dispense with the requirements of the statute of frauds, upon the principle of preventing a fraud. A court of law has no such dispensing power. Baldwin v. Palmer, 61 D. 743.

It is not every possible act of a vendee, done with reference to a parol contract for sale of land, that will remove it from the statute of frauds, but only those to which he has been induced by positive action or permission of the vendor; or at most by those results that naturally flow from the agreement. Poland v. O'Connor, 93 D. 327.

The purchase of a building by a vendee in a parol contract for sale of land, with a view to placing it on the premises, will not take the contract out of the statute of frauds. Id.

11. Effect of purchaser's going into possession. — The court must determine what acts constitute possession so as to defeat an action of trespass, or make out a contract for the sale of the land, so as to take the case out of the statute of frauds, and it is error to leave those questions to the jury. Baring v. Peirce, 40 D. 534.

A parol agreement by one person, to purchase land and convey it to another whenever advances are repaid, is void under the statute of frauds; and an entry by the latter upon the land before it is purchased by the former is not such possession, under and in part execution of the contract, as will take it out of the statute. Myers v. Byerly, 84 D. 497; Johnson v. Hanson, 41 D. 54; but possession is an indispensable accompaniment of every parol contract that hopes for specific performance. Workman v. Guthrie, 72 D. 654.

It is no part performance of a verbal agreement for the sale of land, where vendee takes possession and erects a building, but without direction, knowledge, or consent of the vendor. Hoen v. Simmons, 52 D. 291; Johnston v. Glancy, 28 D. 45.

Temporary erections, or surveying land, or repeated acts of ownership, such as cutting timber, do not constitute such a possession as will take a parol contract for the sale of lands out of the statute of frauds, though such acts constitute the only possession usually taken of uncultivated timber-land. Gangwer v. Fry, 55 D. 578. S. P., Baring v. Peirce, 40 D. 534.

Possession taken by a purchaser under an agreement for sale of lands, at a time when the seller had no control over them, is not such part performance of the agreement as will take it out of the operation of the statute of frauds; and neither is the building of a mill on other lands of the purchaser, where the agreement merely provides that if the mill is built, the price of the lands will be less. Osborn v. Phelps, 48 D. 133.

Remaining in possession by a tenant is not a sufficient part performance. Johnston v. Glancy, 28 D. 45; unless it is shown that when the contract was made it was specially agreed that thenceforth the tenancy should cease and the possession should be deemed to be under the contract. Blanchard v. McDougal, 70 D. 458; Thompson v. Thompson, 68 D. 638.

If a purchaser by parol takes possession under his contract, and afterwards attorns to the vendor as landlord, or fixes upon himself any other character than that with which he entered, he lets go his equities, and his possession is referred to his new agreement. Rankin v. Simpson, 57 D. 668.

The mere fact that the plaintiff, after the making of the contract, and until the commencement of the action, continued to reside upon the land, and to improve and cultivate the same, is not a part performance. Wentworth v. Wentworth, 72 D. 97.

Acts of possession done after a vendor has disavowed a parol contract for sale of land, made by an unauthorized agent, are without warrant, and will not take the contract out of the statute of frauds. Poland v. O'Connor, 93 D. 327.

Possession taking a parol contract for the sale of land out of the statute of frauds is not shown by proof that the vendee used the lot which adjoined his warehouse for storing lumber and wagons. Id.

A contract held to be merely executory, where a father, who owned a tract of unimproved land, said to his son that he would give him one half of the land, not designating which, if he would remain with him a year, although the promise, in nearly the same terms, was afterwards repeated, designating the north half, and although the son assented and remained with his father, and some marks were made to indicate the line, and some improvements were made; and the whole tract will pass at a sheriff's sale under a judgment entered against the father prior to a conveyance of the land from the father to the son. Willey v. Day, 88 D. 562.

A parol contract for the sale of land by an agent of the owner, and his admission of the purchaser into possession, are unauthorized, and do not take the case out of the statute of frauds, nor furnish a defense to an action of trespass by the owner, where the agent is acting under a special authority requiring him to enter into written contracts for the sale of the land. Baring v. Peirce, 40 D. 534.

A vendee under an alleged parol contract in possession for a long time is not held to proof so rigid as under a recent sale. Willey v. Day, 88 D. 562.

A parol sale of land, accompanied by possession, passed a title as valid and legal as a written conveyance in Texas before the adoption of the principles of the statute of frauds. Briscoe v. Bronaugh, 46 D. 108.

Possession delivered in pursuance of a parol agreement is such a degree of performance as to take the contract out of statute of frauds. Ryan v. Dox, 90 D. 696. But a continuance of possession by one purchasing while in possession will not do so, it seems; but the purchaser cannot be turned out until the purchase-money is repaid. Thompson v. Thompson, 68 D. 638.

Entering into possession by the vendee, with the consent of the vendor, is a part performance which will entitle the vendee to prove the terms of the contract by parol. Townsend v. Houston, 27 D. 732.

To take a parol contract for the sale of land out of the statute of frauds, there must be unequivocal and satisfactory evidence of possession given and entered upon, or of acts clear, certain, and definite in their object, and having reference to the contract. Poland v. O'Connor, 93 D. 327; Wentworth v. Wentworth, 72 D. 97; Gangwer v. Fry, 55 D. 578.

Delivery of possession by a vendor to his vendee and continuation thereof by the latter, together with the payment of a considerable part of the purchase-money, will take a parol agreement for the sale of land out of the statute of frauds, provided the possession be taken and continued under the contract. Blanchard v. McDougal, 70 D. 458.

12. — and making improvements. — The statute of frauds is not a good defense where the party relying on it has been guilty of fraud in permitting another to make improvements on lands without objection. Town v. Needham, 24 D. 246.

The plaintiff, owning a piece of wild land, told the defendants that the premises should be theirs as long as they lived, and put them in possession of the same. The defendants occupied the premises for a number of years, and made extensive improvements upon them. Held, that the expenditures made upon permanent improvements constituted, in equity, a consideration for the promise of the plaintiff, and that the performance of the promise, although by parol, could be enforced in equity, and that an action of ejectment would not lie against defendants in possession. Freeman v. Freeman, 3 R. 657. S. P., Kurtz v. Hibner, 8 R. 665; Hardesty v. Richardson, 22 R. 57; Johnston v. Glancy, 28 D. 45.

The provision of the statute of frauds concerning contracts not to be performed within a year does not apply to contracts for the sale of lands; and therefore where one entered and made improvements on land under an oral agreement to pay for it and to receive a deed in two years, — held, that a suit for specific performance would lie. Fall v. Hazelregg, 15 R. 278.

A entered on land belonging to B, and without his knowledge or permission cleared it and made certain improvements. B afterwards agreed by parol with A, against whom he had brought an action of ejectment for possession, that he would sell the land to A, or pay him for the improvements. It was held that though the promise to sell the land was clearly void by the statute of frauds, yet the promise to pay for the improvements was not within the statute. Frear v. Hardenbergh, 4 D. 356.

Parol gift of land is not so far executed by reason of improvements as to take the case out of the statute of frauds, and prevent a rescission, where it appears that the donee has been in possession five years, but has made improvements not to exceed the value of one year's rent, and those not of permanent value. Wack v. Sorber, 30 D. 269.

A parol contract to convey land is not taken out of the statute of frauds by the fact that in pursuance of it, a son left his trade in town to go upon a farm, cleared and fenced the land, erected farm buildings, planted an orchard, and the like, under a promise by his father to give him the land in consideration of his services, and his coming to live thereon. McKowen v. McDonald, 82 D. 576.

2. Interpretation, and Rights of the Parties.

13. The relation and respective rights and interests of the parties, generally. — He who is bound to do the first act has the right of election. Accordingly, where a party bound himself to convey four hundred acres of land out of one of two tracts, he has his election out of which tract he will convey. Fleming v. Harrison, 4 D. 691.

Waste after a contract or sale, where possession is to be delivered at a future day, must be borne by the vendor, if committed by his tenants. In such a case, he must tender compensation before he can require the vendee to perform his part of the contract. Durrett v. Simpson, 16 D. 115.

A parol grant of a branch line from a principal line of water-pipes from a fountain creates a tenancy at will only. It does not disable the grantor from executing a prior contract of sale. Ib.

Where a vendee receiving his deed is unable to pay the bond given for the purchase-money, the vendor, knowing this, may make a new agreement, and take back all or part of the land, and release the whole or part of the debt. Bavington v. Clarke, 21 D. 432.

Different parts of a bargain for the sale of land take effect simultaneously, or in such order as may best effectuate the intention of the parties, whatever may be the order in which the documents are executed. Wheeler v. Freeman, 23 D. 674.

A grantor with a warranty who puts a third person in possession is presumed to act on behalf or as agent of his grantee. Warner v. Page, 24 D. 607.

A contract for the sale of land is in fieri while it remains unexecuted by a conveyance, after which the purchase-money may not be detained or recovered back but by force of a covenant or fraud, for any encumbrance or defect of title whatever. Lighty v. Shorb, 24 D. 334.

No principle of law allows one man to substitute himself as the vendor, in a contract for the sale of land, in place of another, against the will of the vendee. Taylor v. Porter, 25 D. 155.

A policy issued to a vendor of property before the sale, and not assigned to the purchaser, protects his insurable interest to the extent of the unpaid purchase-money, but does not affect the purchaser's liability for such unpaid balance. Aetna F. Ins. Co. v. Tyler, 30 D. 90.

A purchaser of land, under a contract of sale, can do nothing to the prejudice of his vendor's rights so long as the relation continues. Meadows v. Hopkins, 33 D. 140.

A vendor's right to immunity from acts to his prejudice by a purchaser in possession does not depend on the vendor's having title to the land at the time of sale. Ib.

A vendor of real estate holds the legal title as security for the payment of purchase-money, where he has given no deed to the purchaser. Conner v. Banks, 52 D. 209.

Where a vendor of real estate executes a bond to make title, the contract will be considered in a court of equity as in the nature of a conveyance to the purchaser, and a reconveyance back by way of mortgage. Ib.

Where one of two joint owners of land, who are bound by contract to convey it, transfers his interest to his co-owner, the latter will then be bound to convey to the party entitled to demand such conveyance, even though such party be his former co-owner, who joined with him in the contract. Kerr v. Day, 53 D. 526.

Where the grantor of land gives to the grantee the right to cut lumber thereon, without limitation as to the person who may do it, subject to a lien thereon for the payment of the purchase-money of the land, the lumber may be lawfully removed from the land by persons who have contracted with the grantee for getting it out, and the grantor will be regarded as having fully authorized such contract. Spofford v. True, 54 D. 621.

Outstanding titles or encumbrances purchased in by a vendor or mortgagor inure to the benefit of the vendee. Busk v. Cooper, 59 D. 270.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

In an agreement or contract for sale of lands, the vendor becomes trustee of the land for the benefit of the vendee, and the trust thus acquired by the vendee arises or results by the implication or construction of law. Maddox v. Rowe, 68 D. 535.

Where a vendor of real estate surrenders the possession of the premises to the vendee, or where the vendee is in possession thereof at the time of sale, and the vendor afterwards, without the vendee's consent, takes possession of the same, he is liable to the vendee for any rents received by him during such possession. Shawhan v. Long, 96 D. 164.

14. Interpreting the contract as respects the covenants contained in it.* — By an agreement under seal, the defendant covenanted to pay, by a certain day, a stipulated sum for a lot of land, and the plaintiff therein covenanted that he would then, on the performance of this covenant, "execute to him, his heirs and assigns, a good warranty deed of conveyance." In an action for a breach by the defendant, — held, that the covenants were dependent, and the words "a good warranty deed of conveyance" referred to the instrument, and not to the title, and a plea that the plaintiff was not seised was bad, as the action being on a specialty, a failure of consideration was no defense. Parker v. Parmele, 11 D. 253.

A vendor who sells and covenants to convey, without warranty, "all his right, title, and interest" in land, is bound to show that he has some right, title, or interest that he can convey. Jackson v. Tool, 25 D. 162.

Such a covenant implies that he has some right, title, or interest which will pass by a conveyance to the vendee, and if he has none, the stipulation on his part is a nullity, and the contract will be rescinded at the instance of the vendee. Ib.

Such vendor need not show, however, that he has the best title, nor even a title regularly derived from the commonwealth, to comply with such agreement, but he must show that he had at least some right to the land. Ib.

A naked possession might be such a right as would, if transferred and conveyed, satisfy such covenant on the vendor's part. Ib.

A person agreeing to convey so many acres of land out of a larger tract, provided that quantity remains unsold and free from certain claims, may select it from any part of such larger tract, but he must lay it off, and show that it is unsold and free from such claims. Ib.

Where a covenantor agrees to convey to the covenantee, by a day certain, one of several lots, to be selected by the covenantee, if the latter fails to make a selection by that day, the right to do so passes to the covenantor, and he may tender a conveyance of either of the lots. Bell v. Quarles, 26 D. 280.

A sale of one of the lots mentioned in such covenant by the covenantor after the day fixed for the covenantee to make his selection amounts to an election by the former that the latter shall not have the lot sold, and a subsequent selection of that lot by the covenantee is invalid. Ib.

The failure of the covenantee to select a lot prior to the day that the covenantor was bound to convey will not defeat his right to recover damages, if the latter fails to tender him a deed of one of the lots. Ib.

The measure of damages in such action would be, where no demand is made on the covenantor to convey any particular lot, the value of any unsold lot, and interest from the commencement of the action. Ib.

In an agreement to convey, words that party "shall have the privilege of purchasing" are sufficient in equity to entitle him to a conveyance of all the estate of the vendor at the time of the contract, although such words are not so comprehensive as a positive agreement to convey, which means, when not qualified by words or circumstances, to convey the fee. Hawralty v. Warren, 90 D. 613.

In a contract for the sale of land, the vendee agreed to pay the purchase-money in installments, and the vendor to deliver the deed upon payment of the last installment. Held, that the covenants were independent, and that the vendor could enforce payment of all the installments without first tendering the deed. Bowen v. Bailey, 2 R. 601. But see, contra, by the same court, Robinson v. Harbour, 2 R. 671.

Where the vendee of land covenants to pay for it by installments, and the vendor covenants to make title upon the payment of the last installment, the covenants of the vendee, except the last one, are independent; but the vendee's covenant to pay the last installment, and of the vendor to make title, are dependent, because they are concurrent acts of the parties to be done or performed at the same time; and to entitle either the vendor or vendee to maintain an action against the other, he must aver and prove performance, or tender or offer of performance, of his part of the agreement. Robinson v. Harbour, 97 D. 501.

15. — as respects the description of the premises to be conveyed. — He who sells property on a description given by himself is bound to make good that description; and if it be untrue in a material point, although the variance be occasioned by a mistake, he must still remain liable for that variance. McCall v. Davis, 94 D. 92.

In a written contract for the sale of land, the premises were described as "the east ½ of N. W. ¼, sec. 27, T. 38, 14 E. of 3d P. M."

* Encumbrances, purchaser's right to deduct for, see note, 49 D. 579-582.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

The range and position of the land to the base line were omitted. Held, that this description was sufficient, because a reference to the government land surveys would show that there is no township 38 south of the base line and 14 east of the 3d P. M., and hence it must be north of the base, and in 14 east of said meridian, which would locate the land in Cook County. White v. Hermann, 99 D. 543.

A contract for a conveyance of lands is good and binding, if their description is sufficient to enable a surveyor to locate them; and this is a question for the jury, to be determined from the evidence, unless it is manifest from the instrument that such lands cannot be located. Ib.

The court will not permit a contract for the conveyance of land to fail, when, from the entire instrument and the general acts of the government, it can be seen what was intended by the parties. Ib.

16. How far the purchaser is deemed the owner. — A purchaser of land, under a verbal agreement, who has paid the purchase-money and gone into possession, has only an equitable interest in the premises before conveyance. Jackson v. Morse, 8 D. 306; Chapman v. Glassell, 48 D. 41; Monroe v. West, 79 D. 524.

He is entitled to whatever advantage may thereafter arise to it, and bound to sustain any loss that may befall it. Reed v. Lukens, 84 D. 425; Brewer v. Herbert, 96 D. 582. Which equitable interest he cannot set up as a bar to a recovery in ejectment, although he is in the actual possession under the bond. Nickles v. Haskins, 50 D. 154; Brill v. Stiles, 85 D. 364. But when he has completed his part of the contract, by paying the purchase-money, and receiving written evidence of the agreement of the vendor to convey the premises, he acquires such title as may be asserted in a court of equity against the holder of the legal title, whether in the vendor or his vendee, with notice. Brill v. Stiles, 85 D. 364; Peterson v. Orr, 58 D. 484.

Title in equity passes from the date of a contract of sale of real property, though before the vendee takes possession, and before a conveyance or payment of any part of the purchase-money. Nor does the insertion of a stipulation in the contract, to deliver at a future day, have any effect on this rule. The whole foundation of this doctrine of equity is, that the equitable title and interest passes by the contract of sale, and from the time of its execution; and it contemplates delivery of possession as well as payment of purchase-money, and a conveyance at a future period. Brewer v. Herbert, 96 D. 582.

Where the language of a contract is, that the vendor "has this day sold to" the vendee his house and lot, it clearly imports a binding contract, then executed and consummated. By such terms, the title in equity passes from the date of the contract. The contract is not for a sale at a future day. Ib.

In equity, the vendee is not owner adversely to lien of vendor, but is treated as a trustee for him, until the payment of the purchase-money. Walton v. Hargroves, 97 D. 429.

A vendor, under an agreement for the sale of lands which are in the possession of the vendee, cannot maintain an action for an injury to the freehold, committed while the vendee is in possession. Ives v. Cress, 47 D. 401.

A contract for the purchase of land, made bona fide for a valuable consideration, vests the equitable interest in the vendee from the time of the execution of the contract, although the money is not then paid. A judgment obtained by a third person against the vendor, between the making the contract and the payment of the money, during which the vendee was in possession, cannot defeat the equitable interest thus acquired, nor is it a lien on the land affecting the right of the vendee. Hampson v. Edelen, 3 D. 530.

17. Purchaser's right to possession. — One who enters upon land under an executory contract to purchase cannot be evicted by the vendor, unless by some act he makes his possession tortious, as by denying his vendor's title, or by refusing to surrender possession upon sufficient demand and notice; and a mere failure to pay the purchase price will not be sufficient. Harle v. McCoy, 23 D. 407.

The right of possession under a contract for the sale of land remains in the vendor until full payment is made and the vendee has complied with everything required to entitle him to a conveyance; it is not sufficient that he has paid part of the purchase price and executed his notes for the residue. Holmes v. Schofield, 29 D. 364.

One who enters upon land under a contract of sale is but a tenant at will, until the execution of the conveyance, and though he may have paid the purchase-money, his tenancy may be determined by a demand for the possession, and if this be refused, the possession may be recovered in an action of ejectment. Doe v. Brown, 41 D. 217. Foley v. Wyeth, 79 D. 771.

A purchaser under a contract inoperative as a conveyance, but good as an agreement to convey, who has paid the purchase-money and entered into possession of the premises, will be protected by a court of equity against subsequent purchasers with notice. Dutton v. Warschauer, 82 D. 765.

18. Representations and warranties on part of vendor. — 1. In general. — A vendor must disclose all material facts of which he knows vendee to be ignorant. Barnard v. Duncan, 90 D. 416.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

There may be fraud in suppressing and concealing material facts, as well as in direct misrepresentation, if the other party is knowingly suffered to deal under a delusion. Ib.

A vendor is not responsible in damages for every unauthorized, erroneous, or false representation made to the vendee, although it may have been injurious; the representation must have been false, have been fraudulently made, and have occasioned damages. Hammatt v. Emerson, 46 D. 598.

The owner of premises must be supposed to be peculiarly cognizant of the quantity of land fit for cultivation in a tract which he undertakes to sell or lease. And a stranger coming to buy or lease has both a natural and proper right to look to him for such information and to expect the truth. Mitchell v. Zimmerman, 51 D. 717.

The doctrine of implied warranty applies only to articles susceptible of a standard quality, or which are sold by samples, and does not extend to lands which have no standard quality. Pollard v. Lyman, 2 D. 64.

2. As to title.—There is a distinction between the sale of goods and of land in respect of a warranty of title, which is implied in the former, but not in the latter. Dorsey v. Jackman, 7 D. 611.

A fraudulent representation relating to the title to land renders the person making it responsible the same as if made in regard to something collateral. Oliver v. Avery, 22 D. 586.

What is done in good faith, in a contract for a sale or purchase, is merged in the purchase when consummated, and cannot be overhauled; but if representations are known to be false when made, the subsequent consummation of the agreement cannot shield the defendant. Ib.

In every contract for the sale of land, unless contrary intention is expressed, there is an implied undertaking on the part of the vendor, available at law as well as in equity, while the contract remains executory, to make out a good title, clear of all defects and encumbrances. Dwight v. Cutler, 64 D. 106. S. P., Herrod v. Blackburn, 94 D. 49; Cullum v. Branch Bank, 37 D. 725.

Caveat emptor is the rule between vendor and vendee of realty. Collier v. Harkness, 71 D. 216. The vendee must examine the records and title for himself, and so far the rule of caveat emptor may be said to apply to him. But misrepresentations or suppression of material facts are matters collateral to the written contract or deed, and may be inquired into on the ground of fraud. Barnard v. Duncan, 90 D. 416.

Though the state of a title appear from the records, a misrepresentation by the vendor with respect thereto will not be the less fraudulent. Parham v. Randolph, 35 D. 403.

Imperfect titles are subject of sale, and a contract to convey one of them implies no warranty. When the vendee buys simply a title or claim to land, he does so at his own risk. Herrod v. Blackburn, 94 D. 49.

19. Duty of vendor to convey or tender deed.—The vendor must prepare and tender a deed of conveyance, where he covenants to give a title to the purchaser on the payment of the purchase-money. Walling v. Kinnard, 60 D. 216; and demand the purchase-money of vendee, before he can maintain an action for the purchase price, upon an agreement for the sale and purchase of the land, where the stipulations of the parties are dependent. Smith v. Henry, 44 D. 540; Parker v. Parmele, 11 D. 253.

An assignment by the vendor of a bond for purchase-money, on which the action is brought, does not affect his duty to tender a conveyance and demand payment of the purchase-money before the bringing of the action, as under our statute the assignment of a writing obligatory does not deprive the defendant of any defense he may have had against the payee. Smith v. Henry, 44 D. 540; Wallace v. Shaffer, 37 D. 687.

Where a vendor of land agrees to convey legal title on payment of a certain number of installments of the purchase-money, and before those are paid other installments become due, he may retain his legal title as security for the full amount due when the payment is made, and may use such title to compel performance. Thompson v. Carpenter, 45 D. 681.

A tender of the vendor's own deed, without procuring his wife's relinquishment of dower, is not a satisfaction of his covenant to make the vendee "a good and perfect deed." Greenwood v. Ligon, 43 D. 775.

When no time is specified in a bond to convey, the law implies that the conveyance is to be made in a reasonable time. Cock v. Taylor, 5 D. 650.

If no day be specified for the delivery of the deed and of possession, in a contract for the sale of land, but the money is to be paid after the delivery of the deed, it must be understood that the deed was to be delivered and possession given without delay. If, therefore, on account of a misunderstanding of the parties in relation to the terms of sale, this is not done, the grantor is bound to account for the profits of the land after the contract, and the grantee to pay interest on the money from the time it would have been payable had the deed been immediately delivered. Hundley v. Lyons, 7 D. 685.

Where time is given for the payment of the purchase-money, on the sale of land, the vendor is bound to deliver a deed to the vendee at any time of demand before the expiration of the credit. Eveleth v. Scribner, 28 D. 147.

Where time is not made the essence of the contract for the sale of real estate, the bargainer will be held to the contract and compelled to convey, though the purchase-money was not paid or tendered at the exact time fixed in the contract for the payment, provided that compensation can be made him for the delay, and it appears to be conscientious that the conveyance should be made. But the rule is otherwise where parties have made the payment of the money a material and essential part of the contract, and unless the money is paid or tendered at the stipulated time, the obligation of the bargainor to convey is at an end. Hall v. Delaplaine, 68 D. 57.

On a parol contract for the sale of land, partly performed by entry into possession and removal of a store therefrom, if the vendor refuses to give a deed when demanded, he cannot, at the expiration of the term for credit, offer the deed and demand the purchase-money. Evelath v. Scribner, 28 D. 147.

A tender of conveyance is unnecessary where the other party had declared his unwillingness to accept it. Lynch v. Postlethwaite, 12 D. 495. But if the land is subject to encumbrances not declared at the time of the sale, the vendor must satisfy the jury beyond a doubt that he could and would have removed them, or he will not be entitled to damages. Hampton v. Speckenagle, 11 D. 704.

Where a party should deliver a deed on a day certain, and at the day was ready with the deed, and would have tendered it, but for the evasion of the other party, it was held equivalent to a tender. Borden v. Borden, 4 D. 32.

Where, by articles of agreement for the sale of land, the plaintiff was to give a lawful deed of conveyance to the defendant, who was to pay a certain sum therefor, and procure a sheriff's deed of the property sold for unpaid taxes, to be made to plaintiff, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover the consideration agreed to be paid, without making and offering to the defendant a deed of conveyance, although the latter had taken the sheriff's deed in his own name, and had never conveyed to the plaintiff. Dearth v. Williamson, 7 D. 652.

Where a grantee requests the grantor to purchase an outstanding title, and executes his note in payment therefor, the grantor agreeing when the purchase is made and the note paid, to execute a quitclaim deed, he is not in default in failing to make and deliver such deed, and there is no failure of consideration until the note is paid in full. Before such time the grantee has no right to demand the deed. Cassell v. Ross, 85 D. 270.

In America, each successive grantor of realty is presumed to give to his grantee only his deed of conveyance, retaining the immediate deed to himself to rely upon its covenants in case of failure of title. In England, the title deeds go with the land to the purchaser. White v. Hutchings, 88 D. 766.

Replevin or detinue will lie to recover a deed withheld from the person in whom the title to the land thereby conveyed is vested; and if a deed should be lost or destroyed, a court of equity would relieve against its loss, by compelling the execution of another deed. King v. Gilson, 83 D. 269.

20. Duty of purchaser to demand deed. — To sustain an action by the purchaser on a contract to convey, it is necessary to demand a deed of the vendor, and after waiting a reasonable time, to call on him and offer to receive it. Fuller v. Williams, 17 D. 498; Blood v. Goodrich, 24 D. 121. And in case of the vendor's death before such demand, it must be made in like manner of the heirs, to enable the vendee to sue the personal representative on the contract. Fuller v. Williams, 17 D. 498.

That the heirs are numerous and widely dispersed does not dispense with demand upon them. Ib.

Demand upon the administrator is nugatory, as he has no control of the land. Fuller v. Williams, 17 D. 498. Contra, Hendon v. Harrison, 69 D. 399.

A positive refusal to convey on the first demand dispenses with any further demand. Blood v. Goodrich, 24 D. 121.

A demand on one of several joint vendors, and his refusal to execute the deed, dispense with a demand on the others. Ib.

21. Which party should prepare the deed. — The costs of conveyance fall upon the purchaser in the absence of an agreement. Winter v. Jones, 54 D. 379.

The English rule is, it seems, that the vendee must prepare the conveyance and tender it for execution. Fuller v. Hubbard, 16 D. 423. S. P., Morrison v. Caldwell, 17 D. 84.

A vendee need not aver tender of a deed to vendor for execution in his plea to an action by the vendor for the purchase-money, the plea alleging a failure of the plaintiff to execute a deed (overruling Drennon v. Boyer, 5 Ark. 497, and Byers v. Aiken, 5 Id. 419). Smith v. Henry, 44 D. 540. For the vendor must prepare the deed under a contract to execute and deliver a good and sufficient deed. Tinney v. Ashley, 26 D. 620.

The vendor need not prepare and tender a deed as a condition precedent to forfeiture of contract of sale for non-payment of purchase-money. If the purchaser wishes to comply with his contract, he must offer to pay. Wells v. Smith, 31 D. 274.

22. What sort of deed purchaser may insist upon. — 1. In general. — Where one covenants "to give a deed of" certain premises contracted to be sold, the covenant is fulfilled by executing a conveyance of the property, without warranty or personal covenants. Ketchum v. Evertson, 7 D. 384; Van Epps v. Schenectady, 7 D. 330. For under an agreement to sell land, a covenant to convey a good title does not necessarily entitle the covenantee to a warranty deed. Kyle v. Kavanagh, 4 R. 560.

A covenant to furnish a warranty deed means a deed with special warranty, and not a deed with general warranty and with covenant against encumbrances. Withers v. Baird, 32 D. 754.

A purchaser of a fee-simple is only entitled to a covenant against acts of grantor and his heirs; that is, a covenant of special warranty. Lloyd v. Farrell, 86 D. 563.

A vendor of real estate in his own right is bound to convey the same with general warranty unless it be otherwise agreed between the parties. Hoback v. Kilgore, 21 R. 317.

Under a general contract to sell real property, the vendor will be required to convey by a deed containing covenants of general warranty; covenants against vendor's own acts merely will not be sufficient. Dwight v. Cutler, 64 D. 105.

A contract for the conveyance of real estate by deed, with the "usual covenants," entitles the grantee to covenants of seisin, of right to convey, against encumbrances, of quiet enjoyment, and of warranty. Wilson v. Wood, 88 D. 231.

What are the "usual covenants" in deeds in a given locality may be referred to a master to inquire. Id.

A covenant to give a "clear deed," the vendor having a life estate only in the land, which is known to the vendee, entitles the vendee to a life estate only, and in case of a breach, even though the measure of damages is the value of the land, it is the value of the life estate, and not of the fee, which is to govern. Rahr v. Kndt, 39 D. 53.

A contract "to make a warranty deed free and clear of all encumbrances" is not satisfied by a deed containing covenants of general warranty and freedom from encumbrances unless the grantor has at the time a perfect and unencumbered title; and if the grantee accept the deed in ignorance of an existing encumbrance, he may afterwards reject it on discovering the encumbrance. Porter v. Noyes, 11 D. 30.

It is a fraud on the part of the vendor to conceal the fact that part of the land contracted for belongs to a third person; and a covenant of warranty in a deed by such third person is not an execution of the contract of the vendor to convey with warranty. Cook v. Grant, 16 D. 564.

The vendor cannot compel the vendee to accept a conveyance of the land by such third person after considerable delay, where the property had greatly depreciated. Id.

A covenant to give a "lawful deed of conveyance" means a deed conveying a lawful or good title. Dearth v. Williamson, 7 D. 652.

A contract by three to convey land with warranty is not complied with by a conveyance with warranty by one of the three warrantors, and a release or quitclaim deed from the other two. Lawrence v. Parker, 2 D. 10.

A purchaser of land who refuses to accept the deed tendered, on account of an alleged defect in it, cannot show as a ground of damages that the vendor was unable to deliver possession. Pickering v. Stapler, 9 D. 336.

2. Meaning of "good and sufficient deed." — A bond to make a good and sufficient deed to land requires a general warranty. Fleming v. Harrison, 4 D. 691. And a contract to give a "good and sufficient warranty deed" is satisfied by a valid warranty deed conveying such title as the grantor has. Tinney v. Ashley, 26 D. 620; Green v. Covilland, 70 D. 725; Babcock v. Wilson, 35 D. 263.

A contract to deliver a "good and sufficient deed, with covenants of warranty," will be held to mean a good and sufficient title, when it appears from the agreement and the attendant circumstances that such was the intention of the parties. Tindall ad. Den, 40 D. 220.

An agreement to give a good and valid deed calls for a deed that will convey the title to the land. Stow v. Stevens, 29 D. 139; Greenwood v. Ligon, 48 D. 775; Everson v. Kirtland, 27 D. 91. For the defendant admits plaintiff's title by the execution of such agreement, and cannot afterwards deny it; and the plaintiff is not bound to produce further evidence of title than the agreement. Tindall ad. Den, 40 D. 220.

The deed must be good and sufficient, both in form and substance, to convey a valid title to the land which the covenantor has agreed should be conveyed. Everson v. Kirtland, 27 D. 91.

A party contracting in writing to sell a lot of land, and "to convey and release the same to the vendee by a good and sufficient deed," binds himself to give a good title to such land; and when he has given such a deed in pursuance of the agreement, he cannot complain that its covenants protect the vendee from certain liens which it was verbally understood he should be liable for. Story v. Conger, 93 D. 546.

A deed good in form only is not a sufficient compliance with the covenant to make "a good and perfect deed." Good title is necessary to make "a good and perfect deed." Feemster v. May, 53 D. 83.

23. Rights and duties of purchaser in respect to payment of price. — A clause in an agreement for the sale of land, to the effect that if the vendee or his assignee should fail to pay the purchase price within ten days after the same becomes due, he thereby forfeits all claim to said land and the moneys paid thereon, "and this bond, in such event, shall be void, both in law and equity, and the title to said lots shall continue in the original proprietor, as if no sale had been made," will be construed as a penalty to insure a prompt performance by the purchaser, and not as releasing the vendee from liability upon his failure to pay the purchase price. Mason v. Caldwell, 48 D. 330.

In equity, time is not considered to be of the essence of the contract for the conveyance of real estate, unless the parties expressly agree that it shall be so regarded, or unless it follows from the nature and purposes of the contract. Jones v. Robbins, 50 D. 593.

The time of payment is, in equity, regarded as formal, in ordinary cases of sales of real estate, and as meaning only that the purchase shall be completed within a reasonable time and substantially according to the contract, regard being had to all the circumstances. Id.

Where a party is too sick to attend to business at the time when a payment under a contract for the sale of real estate becomes due, that fact will prevent a forfeiture of his right under the contract, on account of his failure to make the payment at that time, especially if, after his recovery, he seeks permission of the other party to make the payment, and the latter shows by his conduct that he intended, from the time of the default, to insist upon the forfeiture, and that he would not have accepted any subsequent tender. Id.

A vendor may insist on the payment of or security for the purchase-money on tendering a deed of the land sold, as a condition of delivering the deed. Salmon v. Hoffman, 56 D. 322.

A delay of twenty days is unreasonable, and the vendor is not bound, where he agrees to convey timber to the vendee if the latter shall make and deliver notes in payment within a week, or within that time set a day for the consummation of the contract. Mixell v. Burnett, 69 D. 744.

The neglect of the vendee to comply with his agreements is not excused by the circumstance that the title to the land was in litigation, if the litigation was pending when the contract was made, and an adverse determination was provided against by the vendee by taking the guaranty of a third person. McAusland v. Pundt, 93 D. 358.

The entry of a judgment against a vendor of land is not constructive notice to the vendee in possession, and subsequent payments to the vendor are not at his peril. Filley v. Duncan, 93 D. 337.

Actual notice given by a judgment creditor to the vendee, of the entry of his judgment against the vendor, will not, it seems, make subsequent payments by the vendee to the vendor payments at his peril. Id.

A party unconditionally accepting an offer to sell land for cash cannot demand a deed or obtain the right of possession until he has tendered the purchase-money to the vendor in person at his residence or elsewhere; and so the vendor cannot maintain his action for the price until he has properly tendered to the other his deed at the latter's residence. Northwestern I. Co. v. Meade, 94 D. 557.

Defendant executed a bond for a warranty deed, to be delivered on a certain day if the purchase-money was then paid. The plaintiff paid some money down. At the time appointed, defendant was unable to make title, but plaintiff was ready, willing, and able to perform. Held, that the delivery of the deed and the payment of the money were concurrent; that plaintiff need not bring the money into court to keep the tender good; and that he could recover the money paid down. Clark v. Weis, 29 R. 60.

A vendor and vendee do not stand in relation of mortgagee and mortgagor, so that in equity the vendee will have the same time to perform that is given to a mortgagor to redeem. Kirby v. Harrison, 59 D. 677.

24. Right of purchaser to dispute vendor's title. — One entering under an executory contract of purchase is bound by the title of his vendor as though he had entered as tenant. Fowler v. Cravens, 20 D. 153. S. P., Greene v. Munson, 31 D. 605; Seabury v. Stewart, 58 D. 254.

A vendee in possession, having recovered purchase-money, must restore the possession to the vendor, and cannot dispute his title, or set up the title of a third person. Fowler v. Cravens, 20 D. 153.

One who enters under a contract for the purchase of lands, and makes permanent improvements, cannot, before complying with the terms of the contract, convey to another a title which, though buying in ignorance of the contract, he can set up against the person with whom it was made. Bowser v. Walker, 18 D. 670.

Instances in which vendee may deny vendor's title considered. Smith v. Babcock, 93 D. 498.

The title of a vendor may be denied in an action by him to recover damages for the removal by the defendants under the direction of the vendee, and while the premises were in the latter's possession under a contract of purchase which was subsequently rescinded, of buildings which were standing upon said premises. The defendants, having made no contract with the vendor, are trespassers merely, so far as he is concerned, and the idea of estoppel or privies is inapplicable, and it is therefor, and for the reason that they are liable to the real owner only for an injury to the reversion, that they may show that the plaintiff is not such owner. Id.

25. — or buy in outstanding title. — A purchaser who goes into possession under a contract of sale cannot set up any outstanding title which he may have purchased in, unless he first make a bona fide surrender of the possession, and bring his action to try that title. Greeno v. Munson, 31 D. 605; Champlin v. Dotson, 53 D. 102.

A vendee who buys in outstanding encumbrances, or procures another party to do so for the benefit of the vendee, will not be permitted to set up an adverse title under them against the vendor. Champlin v. Dotson, 53 D. 102; until he has, bona fide, surrendered his possession, or by some unequivocal act repudiated the contract, and this is known to the vendor. Greeno v. Munson, 31 D. 605.

A vendee who purchases outstanding encumbrances will only be entitled to be credited for the amount which he expended in purchasing the encumbrances. If he should claim more than this, a court of equity will interpose to prevent a recovery. Champlin v. Dotson, 53 D. 102.

The relation of landlord and tenant does not exist between vendor and vendee, and the vendee entering under a void contract of sale may buy in an outstanding title superior to his vendor's, and rely upon it in ejectment, or a bill in equity for possession prosecuted by the vendor. Redmond v. Bowles, 73 D. 153.

A vendee under a void contract of sale, who purchases an outstanding paramount title, is not liable to the vendor for the contract price less the amount necessarily expended for the better title, though he would have been so liable had the contract of sale been a valid one, even where the vendor had no title. Ib.

26. Right of vendor to set up hostile title.*—A vendor of a tract of land who derives his title from one grant or source cannot set up another conflicting claim, acquired before or after the sale, to prejudice the title of his vendee. Finley v. Lynch, 5 D. 635.

27. Remedies of purchaser for defects in title.—If the vendor represents his title as clear and undisputed, an inconsiderable interference, so small as not to raise a presumption that it would materially have influenced the purchaser, is not sufficient to vacate the contract in equity, the remedy being for damages against the vendor at law. Finley v. Lynch, 5 D. 635.

A vendor's loss of mesne conveyances in a chain of title cannot be used by the vendee as an objection to the title after partly executing the contract by taking possession, for the defect may be supplied by a bill in perpetuam rei memoriam; still less can he object where he has not performed his own covenants, and the lost deed is found before the title is tendered. Cassell v. Cooke, 11 D. 610.

A purchaser of land, knowing the title to be defective, takes the risk upon himself. Rohr v. Kindt, 39 D. 53; being presumed to have been compensated for the risk in the collateral advantages of the bargain. Lighty v. Shorb, 24 D. 334.

Where there is a covenant against a known defect, the vendee shall not detain the purchase-money, unless the covenant has been broken. He shall be bound to perform his engagement wherever his knowledge and the state of the facts continue to be the same as they were at the time of the conveyance. Lighty v. Shorb, 24 D. 334.

One who accepts a conveyance with covenants for title, upon which he has an adequate remedy at law, cannot enjoin the assignee of a note for part of the purchase price, because of an encumbrance, without asking a rescission. The rule is otherwise if the grantor has become insolvent; but if he were insolvent at the time of the sale, and the purchaser knew this, and relied upon covenants running with the land, and contained in prior conveyances, he is not entitled to any injunction. Morrison v. Beckwith, 16 D. 136.

Vendee of one of several joint owners of a tract of land, between whom a partition has taken place, cannot, if evicted, demand from a vendee of another of the joint owners a portion of the land sold to him, but he must pursue his vendor in an action of warranty. Compton v. Mathews, 22 D. 167.

Where there is a contract for sale of several adjoining parcels of land for an entire sum, with general warranty of title, and the purchaser is evicted from a portion for want of title, he may hold the remainder, and have proportionate abatement or compensation, although there was a mutual mistake as to the title. Butcher v. Peterson, 55 R. 89.

A bond executed by the vendor of a tract of land to the vendee, as indemnity to the latter for the loss of the land by a paramount title, is founded upon a sufficient consideration, although the vendee has not been evicted by such paramount title. Butler v. Triplett, 25 D. 136.

Where the vendor of a tract of land covenants with the vendee that if any of the land is lost he will convey, of another tract, two acres for every one lost, and a paramount title appears, of which the vendor has notice, and subsequent to which he sells the land out of which the indemnity was to be made, for a price paid, per acre, equal to that he received for the first tract sold, he will be accountable to the first vendee for the proceeds of twice as many acres as have been lost, although that amount be double the consideration that the latter paid for it. Ib.

The right of a purchaser of land to a good title is given by the law, and does not rest upon the agreement of the parties. Cullum v. Branch Bank, 37 D. 725.

Equity will not require the payment of purchase-money when a pre-existing encumbrance is discovered, no conveyance having been executed. Id.

* Subsequent title acquired by vendor, when vests in vendee, see note, 53 D. 583-589.

Vendee's extinguishment of an encumbrance inures to the benefit of the vendor, and entitles the vendee to a proportionate abatement of the purchase price. Meadows v. Hopkins, 33 D. 140.

A vendee who takes security from his vendor against an existing mortgage upon the land sold is not confined to such security after a foreclosure and eviction thereunder, if both the vendor and his securities are or become insolvent, but is entitled to a pro tanto abatement of the purchase price as against the vendor and those claiming under and liable to the equities existing against him. Andrews v. McCoy, 42 D. 669.

A vendee in possession under a deed of warranty, with no fraud made manifest, and with nothing to show that the covenantor is not able to pay any damages that may be recovered against him, has no right to call his vendor into a court of equity to litigate an adverse legal title. Vick v. Percy, 45 D. 303.

The purchaser has a right to have the unpaid money first applied to relieve his land of lien or encumbrance. Withers v. Carter, 50 D. 78.

A purchaser may deduct the amount of encumbrances from the purchase-money due, where he has given a mortgage therefor, though the encumbrances were known to him at the time he made the contract of purchase. Wolbert v. Lucas, 49 D. 578. S. P., Martin v. Atkinson, 50 D. 403.

A sale by the sheriff, of land in the possession of a vendee under a contract for the sale thereof, amounts to an eviction, and vacates such contract. Martin v. Atkinson, 50 D. 403.

The price paid by a vendee in a contract for the sale of land, who repurchases the same after it has been sold under a mortgage or judgment lien existing at the time of the contract, is no criterion of the damages he has sustained in an action against his vendor for the eviction. Id.

A mistake in regard to the validity of a grantor's title is no ground for relief to a purchaser, when he purchases land without agreement, express or implied, for a conveyance with warranty of the title. Sutton v. Sutton, 56 D. 109.

A vendee of real estate is put on guard as to title by a contract to convey to him lots "by the same title" by which a certain person "held them at the time of his death." Such language is as forcible as the legal maxim of caveat emptor; and it is sufficient, where he claims a defect in the title, that the conveyance placed him in actual possession of the premises. Salmon v. Hoffman, 56 D. 322.

A purchaser of real estate, upon becoming aware of the invalidity of his title, may surrender to the rightful owner, and he is under no obligation to his grantor to remain and litigate, and probably recover the value of improvements made by such grantor. Drew v. Toole, 64 D. 309.

A vendor having knowledge of a defect in his title cannot bind his vendee, ignorant of the facts, by an agreement to assume all the risk of the title; the concealment of the facts in such a case is a constructive fraud. Lloyd v. Farrell, 86 D. 563.

Where a husband has contracted to convey land, and his wife afterwards refuses to join in a deed and relinquish her dower, the vendee may either accept performance by the husband to the extent of his ability, and retain so much of the purchase-money as shall be proportionate to the utmost possible outstanding or contingent interest not certainly conveyed to him, without interest, until the title is perfected, or refuse such partial title, and have his action for damages for the breach of the contract. Leach v. Forney, 89 D. 574.

A purchaser who becomes unable to return property before he discovers a defect of title of the vendor is remediless, unless he has protected himself by covenants of warranty; and this rule applies to sales by executors and administrators. Ware v. Houghton, 93 D. 258.

A vendee of land will be allowed only fair value of what is not conveyed, where the vendor is unable to give a perfect title, and the vendee elects to take such title as the vendor can give, with compensation for the deficiency. Woodbury v. Luddy, 92 D. 731.

Defects of title which court of equity will consider are such as exist at time of inquiry, and not such as existed at the time of the contract of sale. Consequently, where a vendee has held possession under the title derived from his vendor until defects which existed at the time of the sale have been cured by the statute of limitation, or by adverse possession, he will not be allowed to take advantage of them. Piedmont Coal Co. v. Green, 98 D. 799.

Where a purchaser goes into possession of premises under a contract of sale, and the title of the vendor fails, or he is unable to make conveyance as stipulated by the contract, such purchaser cannot retain possession and enjoyment of the premises by virtue of the contract, and at the same time avoid the payment of the purchase price. McIndoe v. Morman, 7 R. 96.

The vendor may maintain an action for a strict foreclosure and forfeiture of the purchaser's rights under the contract, unless the latter offer to rescind; and it is not necessary that the plaintiff should tender a deed conveying a clear title before such action can be brought or maintained. Id.

28. Compensation for deficiency in quantity of land. — As a general rule, when a person sells land by the metes and bounds of an original grant, if the purchaser gets all the land embraced by that grant, he has no cause of complaint, except where there is a special covenant, or some willful misrepresentation. Bond v. Quattlebaum, 10 D. 702.

Relief for the deficiency in a sale of lands will be granted in equity where the grantor misrepresented the quantity of acres in the tract, although the sale may have been in gross, and not by the acre. Pringle v. Samuel, 13 D. 214.

If a line be shown to a party as the southern boundary of a tract of land which he is about to purchase, whereby he is induced to give eight dollars an acre for the entire tract, supposing it to lie north of the line, when only about half of it lies on that side of the line, and that which lies south of it is only worth two dollars per acre, he may, if he elect, have the land north of the line at the price agreed upon, and the residue at one fourth of that price, the excess of the purchase price to be deducted from the sale notes. Jopling v. Dooley, 24 D. 450.

The conveyance of a particular tract without specification of quantity does not bind the vendor to a warranty of any particular number of acres, though there may have been an expectation in both parties to the sale founded on documents and other evidence known to both, that the tract contained a larger quantity than it actually does. Moore v. Vick, 32 D. 301.

A vendee of land is not entitled to a deduction for a deficiency in the quantity of the land conveyed, from the amount of the bond given therefor, where the sale is per aversionem, or for a gross sum for the whole premises, and not at a stipulated price per foot or acre, the land being described by designated boundaries, followed by a specification of the quantity, unless there has been fraud or willful misrepresentation by the vendor. Morris Canal Co. v. Emmett, 37 D. 388.

An abatement in the purchase price will be allowed in a suit to foreclose a mortgage given for the purchase price, though the contract is executed, where a tract contains less land than the contract of sale and deed call for. Couse v. Boyles, 38 D. 514.

When a misrepresentation is made by the vendor as to the quantity of land, though innocently, the right of the purchaser is to have what the vendor can convey, with an abatement out of the purchase-money for so much as the quantity falls short of the representation. Mitchell v. Zimmerman, 51 D. 717; Walling v. Kinnard, 60 D. 216.

The sale of land in bulk is not defeated by a deficiency in quantity. Faure v. Martin, 57 D. 515.

The only evidence of the value is the price paid where chancery is attempting to adjust a sale of land fraudulent as to quantity. It will look alone to the agreement of the parties to determine the value of the premises in question. Harrell v. Hill, 68 D. 202.

Where there is a deficit in land purchased in gross as containing a certain number of acres, equity will withhold any compensation and damages, because the vendee had the means afforded him at the time of his contract to detect the deficit. Emerson v. Navarro, 98 D. 534.

In the absence of fraud or mutual mistake, a vendor of land is bound by his contract as to quantity, although the result contravenes his intention. Heyer v. Lee, 29 R. 537.

A sale was made of "three tracts of land containing nine hundred ninety-one and a quarter acres, and allowance at twelve shillings and six pence per acre." The vendor afterwards obtained patents in his own name, and executed a conveyance of the tracts to the vendee according to courses and distances as in the patents, and stating them as "containing in the whole nine hundred ninety-one and a quarter acres, and allowance, etc., be the same more or less." The vendee, having previously paid a part of the purchase-money, gave his bonds to the vendor on the day after the conveyance, for the remainder of the purchase-money. Upon a survey made twelve years afterwards, the tracts were ascertained to fall short eighty-eight acres. Held, that the vendee was not entitled to any deduction from his bonds, on account of the deficiency. Smith v. Evans, 6 D. 438.

The maxim caveat emptor will not be applied to protect a fraudulent grantor. Pringle v. Samuel, 13 D. 214.

The fact that a vendee was a neighbor and saw the land daily makes no difference, and the doctrine of caveat emptor has no application. Couse v. Boyles, 38 D. 514.

When land is sold as containing so many acres, "more or less," but the parties contemplate the land as containing the amount called for in the deed, the party sustaining the loss must be allowed for it, if on a survey a material variance between the amount called for and the actual amount is found to exist. Couse v. Boyles, 38 D. 514; Harrell v. Hill, 68 D. 202. But a deficiency of eight acres in a tract of 552 acres is no more than a purchaser who buys for more or less may reasonably expect. Nelson v. Matthews, 3 D. 620. Yet a deficiency small in itself, but large in proportion to the whole tract, will be compensated for, especially where the purchase was brought about by the false assertions of the grantor. Pringle v. Samuel, 13 D. 214.

A contract for the sale of a specified farm added to the designation of it the words "containing ninety-six acres, be the same more or less." The agreed price was sixty dollars per acre. The vendor gave a deed, stating the number of acres in the same way, which the purchaser accepted, he giving a mortgage for the price, computed for ninety-six acres at sixty dollars per acre. In an action (between the original parties) to foreclose this mortgage, the purchaser and mortgagor proved that the quantity was overstated in the deed and mortgage; that by survey the farm contained only eighty-six acres. Held, that the deficiency was no ground for reducing the sum recoverable on the mortgage. Fawcett v. Martin, 57 D. 515.

To estimate upon equitable principles a deficiency in the quantity of land conveyed, subtract what the grantor had a right to believe himself possessed of at the date of sale, as shown, for instance, by his own estimate given in for assessment shortly before, and leaving abrasions of river lands, etc., to be covered by the words "more or less" in the deed, from the number of acres expressed in the deed, and the remainder will be the deficiency. Harrell v. Hill, 68 D. 202.

29. Liability of purchaser for excess in quantity.—Whenever it does not appear that land was sold by the tract and not by the acre, the grantee is responsible for the excess of the number of acres above the estimated quantity; and in ascertaining the amount to be paid for such excess, the average value per acre of the whole tract is the proper rule. Hundley v. Lyons, 7 D. 685.

The vendee in a contract for sale of land is entitled to the excess in ordinary cases, by reason of his liability to loss in case of a deficit. His hazard of a loss is the consideration he pays for the excess, and if that consideration be wanting, he must rely on his express contract, if he would claim an excess. O'Connell v. Duke, 94 D. 282.

The sale of land by the acre, the quantity being estimated, is binding, though actual measurement should show a deficiency or excess. Ashcom v. Smith, 21 D. 437.

Where land is sold at public vendue, by the acre, the vendor saying that he would sell it at a specified number of acres, "more or less," and that it should be measured, the vendee is bound to take it, though the quantity should considerably exceed that specified, and though that was the quantity stated in the published advertisement. Ib.

A vendee refusing to complete the sale is liable in damages to the vendor in such a case. Ib.

The measure of damages in such a case is the difference in price on a resale where the vendor has acted bona fide, and with reasonable care. Ib.

The loss may be cast on the vendor in such a case, by grossly improper conduct, or wanton delay in reselling, or negligence on his part. Ib.

Mere unskillfulness, without mala fides, or negligence, if not palpable, will not charge the vendor with the loss. Ib.

Land was deeded as "containing 140 acres, more or less," and was paid for at the orally agreed price of $27 an acre, and the consideration stated in the deed was the amount of that quantity at that price. Before the execution of the deed it was orally agreed that the land should be surveyed, and if it exceeded that quantity, the purchaser should pay for the excess, and if it fell short, the vendor should refund for the deficiency, at that rate. The quantity proving to be in excess, — held, that the vendor was entitled to recover therefor, and that oral evidence was competent to prove the agreement. Ludeke v. Sutherland, 29 R. 66.

The classification of contracts for the sale of land, with reference to the question of equitable relief to the injured party in case of an unreasonable surplus or deficit stated; adopting and approving the rules in Talbot v. Harrison, 2 Dana, 258. O'Connell v. Duke, 94 D. 282.

30. Compensation for improvements in case of eviction.—A bona fide occupant is entitled to charge for improvements exceeding the rent. Ewing v. Handley, 14 D. 140. S. P., Herring v. Pollard, 40 D. 653; Martin v. Atkinson, 50 D. 403.

One in possession of land under an agreement of purchase which required him to make large expenditures for improvements thereon, as a condition upon which he was to receive his deed, where the title proves to be defective, has an equitable lien upon the land for the value of his improvements. Gibert v. Peteler, 97 D. 785.

Improvements by a vendee in possession who has paid the purchase-money should be allowed for, although they exceed the rents and profits, if the vendor disaffirms the contract and refuses to refund the purchase-money without suit; but the vendee should not be allowed for improvements made after obtaining judgment for the price paid, and rents should commence at that time. Ewing v. Handley, 14 D. 140.

The general equity rule is, that an occupant of land is regarded as the employee of the real owner, and not as his tenant, in clearing and fencing, and rendering it fit for cultivation; but after it is fit for cultivation, the accounts between the owner and occupant should be adjusted on the principles governing landlord and tenant; but many exceptions should be made. Ib.

Where a son who is the tenant of his father's estate makes improvements thereon in pursuance of a promise from the father that upon his death the title to the land shall vest in the son, and the father dies without giving such title, neither the vesting of the title to the land, upon which the improvements were erected, in the son as one of the heirs of the intestate, nor the assignment of such land to the son under an agreement among the heirs, can be regarded as a performance of the intestate's contract. The son may therefore recover of the estate the value of the improvements erected. Smith v. Smith, 78 D. 49.

A son may recover the value of improvements erected, where, being the tenant of his father's estate, he makes such improvements under a promise from the father that upon his death the title to the land shall vest in the son, but the father dies without such title vesting in the son, and an agreement among the heirs contemplates an equal division of the intestate's estate among all the heirs, allowing the son no compensation for the improvements more than he would have received as an heir at law, had the improvements been made by him gratuitously, and exclusively for his father's benefit. Ib.

Where a son who is the tenant of his father refuses to make improvements until he has his father's promise that upon his death the title to the land shall vest in the son, if the son makes the improvements, but fails to get the title to the land, such improvements inure to the benefit of the estate, but the son may recover the value thereof. Ib.

Plaintiff entered upon defendant's land under a verbal contract of purchase, and sowed crops with consent of defendant. Afterward, defendant refused to carry out the contract of sale, and ejected plaintiff. Held, that plaintiff was entitled to the crops. Harris v. Frint, 10 R. 318.

One who is let into possession under a parol contract to purchase is a tenant at will so far as relates to the emblements. Ib.

A purchaser of land, knowing the title to be defective, buys at his own risk, and he is not entitled to compensation for improvements placed upon it from the rightful owner who seeks to recover the land in ejectment, although the latter may have known that the improvements were being made, and made no objection. Walker v. Quigg, 31 D. 452.

No compensation will be allowed in equity for improvements put upon land by one who has entered under a contract to obtain the title, which he has, subsequently to his entry, repudiated. French v. Seely, 32 D. 758; or where he fails to comply with the contract. Seabury v. Stewart, 58 D. 254.

A subpurchaser, waiving his claim for specific performance, and suing for compensation for improvements made, should bring in the same parties and establish the same equities as if he were seeking a specific performance. Henderson v. Pickett, 16 D. 130.

81. Liability of purchaser for use and occupation. — One in possession under a contract for the purchase of land is not liable to pay rent on the implied contract for the use and occupation, if the owner fail to execute a conveyance. Little v. Pearson, 19 D. 289; Dwight v. Outler, 64 D. 105; in absence of an express promise to pay rent. Dennett v. Penobscot Fair Ground Co., 2 R. 58.

A vendee under a verbal contract for the sale of land sustains the relation of tenant at will to his vendor, and is liable to an action for use and occupation of the premises, where the vendee, with the vendor's permission, goes into occupation, without any agreement to pay rent, and fails to pay for the land, and voluntarily abandons the premises. Patterson v. Stoddard, 74 D. 490.

Where the owner of land, with valuable buildings on it, contracts to convey it at a future day on payment of a stipulated price, secured by the purchaser's notes presently given, the purchaser presently taking possession, and the buildings are destroyed by fire, without fault of either party, before payment and conveyance, the vendee is not bound to take the land and pay the notes, but the vendor is entitled to the value of the use and occupancy during the vendee's possession. Gould v. Murch, 25 R. 325.

82. — for rents and profits. — A vendee in possession of land, under a contract of purchase, is not chargeable with rents, nor entitled to interest on the money paid, as long as the parties abide by the contract. Taylor v. Porter, 25 D. 155.

One in the possession of real estate, under a contract for the purchase thereof, is accountable to the actual owner for the rents and profits, after the extinguishment of the title in him under whom possession was taken. Webb v. Conn, 13 D. 225.

A vendee in possession, disaffirming the contract, and recovering damages for non-conveyance, is liable for rents, subject to the value of improvements placed by him on the land. Craig v. Martin, 19 D. 157.

83. Conditions, and how performed. — A vendee of land sold subject to a condition of repurchase is entitled to the rents and profits accruing between the sale and repurchase. Bennet v. Holt, 24 D. 455.

Where a purchaser of land agrees to pay the purchase-money, upon the vendor's delivering to him United States patents therefor, such vendor cannot enforce payment before performing the condition precedent, although Congress may, subsequently to the making of the agreement, have passed an act which rendered the delivery of such patents unnecessary or impracticable. Chouteau v. Russell, 31 D. 191.

Where defendant agreed to remove certain encumbrances from premises conveyed to plaintiff by a certain day, in consideration thereof to be allowed a certain sum on a debt due plaintiff, the removal of the encumbrances by that day is not a condition precedent, and defendant not having removed the encumbrances till the day had passed, he is still entitled to set off the sum stipulated in an action by the plaintiff on the original indebtedness, the plaintiff not having reconveyed the premises to him. Roberts v. Marston, 37 D. 52.

Where plaintiff has suffered damages by the delay, in such a case, he has a right to have them deducted from the amount he agreed to allow for the premises. Ib.

Where land is conveyed on condition that unless the grantee pay certain notes the deed shall be "void so far as to make good any non-fulfillment of said conditions," a breach of the condition will entitle the grantor to obtain possession and hold the property as a pledge or mortgage, until the condition is performed. Fisk v. Chandler, 50 D. 612.

A condition in a contract for the sale of land, "that if default should be made in fulfilling any part of the contract on the part of the purchaser the seller might regard the contract as forfeited, and resell the land," will not exempt the seller, if he enforce the forfeiture, from accounting to the purchaser for payments made, over and above damages accruing from the breach of agreement to the seller. Gilbreth v. Grewell, 74 D. 266.

An agreement to convey land if the vendee should find oil upon it is to be construed as an agreement to convey the land if oil should be found within a reasonable time. Dark v. Johnston, 93 D. 732.

A vendor's agreement, in a contract for the sale of a house and lot, to deliver possession of premises at a future day, does not amount to a condition that the contract shall be void if there is any change in the state or value of the property on the day for its delivery. Brewer v. Herbert, 96 D. 582.

84. Effect of conveyance to merge contract to convey.—When a deed is made in pursuance of a prior agreement, the agreement is thereby made a nullity, and the rights of the parties are controlled by the deed. Kerr v. Calvit, 12 D. 537. S. P., Hunt v. Amidon, 40 D. 283; Timms v. Shannon, 81 D. 632. Contra, Speed v. Hann, 15 D. 78.

A grantee who accepts a deed with a special warranty, and executes bonds and mortgage for purchase-money, cannot claim deduction or abatement from the mortgage debt by reason of an outstanding encumbrance on the land within the warranty, in a suit brought by an assignee to foreclose the mortgage. Timms v. Shannon, 81 D. 632.

85. Construction of contracts for exchange of lands.—Under a parol contract of exchange of lands, where the contracting parties have occupied the tracts exchanged, neither can recover rents of the other. But on declaring such exchange void, the value of the lasting improvements at the time of the decree should be taken into consideration by the court. Stark v. Connady, 14 D. 76.

Where one of two parties to an agreement for the exchange of lands executes his conveyance, and the other then refuses, but afterwards executes his conveyance also, which is accepted, such acceptance is a bar to an action by the first grantor for the rent of the land granted by him between the dates of the two conveyances. Warner v. Bacon, 69 D. 253.

Where one party to an oral agreement for the exchange of lands has executed and delivered his deed, and the other has refused to fulfill his agreement or delivered an invalid deed, an action for money had and received cannot be maintained against the latter, although the land conveyed to him was estimated at a fixed sum, and has been since sold by him and converted into money. The action should be for the price of land sold and conveyed. Basford v. Pearson, 85 D. 764.

Taxes on lands mutually exchanged by warranty deeds, which the parties to such deeds agree shall be set off against each other, are a part of the consideration; and in an action against the vendor by one deriving title by warranty deed from the vendee to recover money paid by the plaintiff to remove the encumbrance so assumed by the vendee, parol evidence of the agreement concerning the taxes is admissible. And if, in such case, it be considered that the warranty of the vendor was broken, still the vendee could agree upon the damages, and, upon their payment, the breach would be satisfied. Robinius v. Lister, 95 D. 674.

II. RIGHTS OF BONA FIDE PURCHASERS.

1. In General.

86. Who are deemed to be bona fide purchasers without notice.*—A purchaser means one who has acquired the legal title, and not merely one who holds a bond for a conveyance. Gilpin v. Davis, 5 D. 622. And in equity is one who, without fraud and for value, acquires a right or interest. James v. Morey, 14 D. 475.

To constitute a person a purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice, it is necessary that he should have paid the money and obtained a conveyance before notice. Blight v. Banks, 17 D. 136.

Payment in full before receiving notice of an equity is essential to constitute a bona fide purchaser. Dugan v. Vattier, 25 D. 105.

Between a purchaser in good faith under the recording act, and a bona fide purchaser within the decisions of the courts of equity, there is no distinction. Grinstone v. Carter, 24 D. 230.

When a creditor merges his judgment into a title, without actual or constructive notice of prior equities, he becomes a purchaser within the meaning of section 2220 of the Revised Statutes of Iowa, 1860, relating to

* Who is a bona fide purchaser without notice, see note, 86 D. 62.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

registry of conveyances of land, and is entitled to equal protection, in the absence of opposing equitable circumstances, with any other subsequent bona fide purchaser. Halloway v. Platner, 89 D. 517.

87. Who are not so deemed. — The doctrine of caveat emptor applies to a purchaser where the title to the land depends upon the construction of a will, which is on record. Tongue v. Nutwell, 79 D. 649. S. P., Fallon v. Chidester, 26 R. 164.

To constitute one a bona fide purchaser, he must, before he has notice of a prior equity, either part with his property on the credit of the estate, or give up some security, or part with some right, or place himself in a worse position than he would have occupied had he received the notice before his purchase. Dickerson v. Tillinghast, 25 D. 528.

One who takes a conveyance of an estate in payment of a debt, without notice of a prior unrecorded mortgage, is not a subsequent bona fide purchaser as against the mortgagee. Id.

A grantee in a voluntary deed is not a bona fide purchaser, who will be protected against an outstanding mortgage of which the grantor had notice; and where such voluntary deed is made for the benefit of the grantor's creditors, the latter acquire no rights under it as against the mortgage. Willis v. Henderson, 38 D. 120.

One to whom a bond and mortgage, given to secure the price of property upon a fraudulent sale, is assigned without any pecuniary consideration being paid, but simply as a gift, does not occupy the position of a bona fide purchaser, so that the contract cannot be rescinded as to him. Baker v. Lever, 23 R. 117.

He is not a bona fide purchaser, who has sufficient notice to put him on inquiry. Durdell v. Haley, 19 D. 444; or who merely takes the legal estate in payment of or as security for a previous debt. Dickerson v. Tillinghast, 25 D. 528; or who has knowledge in fact of a prior unrecorded conveyance. Matter of Conrad Leiman, 3 R. 132.

88. How far protected. — A bona fide purchaser from a fraudulent grantor obtains a title which cannot be affected by the fraud. Dugan v. Vattier, 25 D. 105.

A bona fide purchaser of land, without notice of a mistake in the certificate of a deed, does not by reconveying to his grantor thereby transmit to him the superior equity he acquired as an innocent purchaser. Simpson v. Montgomery, 99 D. 228.

A bona fide purchaser from a fraudulent grantee will hold as against the original grantor. Somes v. Brewer, 13 D. 406; Durell v. Haley, 19 D. 444.

A subpurchaser, in whole or in part, of an equity will be protected from the acts of the original vendor and vendee, and may have a specific execution if he can show a complete equity against his immediate vendor, and also against the holder of the legal title. Henderson v. Pickett, 16 D. 130.

A purchaser with notice, from an innocent purchaser without notice, of a prior unrecorded conveyance, is protected by the innocence and want of notice of his grantor. Bell v. Twilight, 45 D. 367; Boynton v. Rees, 19 D. 326.

A bona fide purchaser, without notice of any fraudulent design, will be protected under the statute of frauds. Garland v. Rives, 15 D. 756. S. P., Scott v. Gallagher, 16 D. 508; Thomas v. Mead, 19 D. 187; Hall v. Delaplaine, 68 D. 57; Harper v. Bibb, 69 D. 397.

A bona fide purchaser is not affected by fraud in his vendor where the latter has the legal title to the property sold. Miles v. Oden, 19 D. 177. But a bona fide purchaser from one having no title cannot obtain any title, for he who has no title can convey none, and a bad title is not made good by the ignorance of the purchaser of its defects, or his want of knowledge of the better title. Barnes v. Meeds, 49 D. 390.

A bona fide purchaser for value takes an estate subject to no other liens than such as attached to it at the time of purchase. Follett v. Reese, 55 D. 472. And without notice of an equitable lien holds the property discharged of the lien. White v. Dougherty, 17 D. 802. S. P., Collier v. Harkness, 71 D. 216. And without notice of agreement to join fences is not bound by such agreement. Houx v. Seat, 72 D. 202. And without notice of equities in favor of the owner of adjoining land, arising out of verbal agreements between him and the grantor, will not be bound thereby. Climer v. Wallace, 75 D. 135.

An innocent purchaser, without notice, of a tract of a land from a person holding the legal title thereto takes it discharged of a trust created by a previous contract to convey to another party, because of the laches of the latter in taking his deed; but where the vendor only holds the equitable title to the land, notice thereof is communicated by a contract to convey, as well as by deed, and the rights of the parties are governed by the maxim, Qui prior est tempore, potior est jure. Craig v. Leiper, 24 D. 479.

A purchaser for value without notice of fraud in his vendor stands upon as high ground in equity as any other creditor or cestui que trust. Hunter v. Lawrence, 63 D. 640.

One who has purchased land by parol, paid the price, and entered into and retained peaceable possession, will be protected in equity against the claim of a subsequent judgment creditor of his vendor. Snyder v. Martin, 41 R. 670.

Upon common-law principles, a voluntary conveyance is void against subsequent bona fide purchasers for a valuable consideration without notice. Fleming v. Townsend, 50 D. 318.

Where a judgment is recovered against a vendor of land of which the vendee is in possession, and the land is sold under the judgment, the vendee who has without notice of the judgment completed his purchase, and received a deed from his vendor before the sheriff's sale, may sustain a bill in equity to have the sheriff's deed declared void, and the possession of the premises decreed to the plaintiff. Filley v. Duncan, 93 D. 337.

A, owning certain lands, and intending to convey the same to his daughter as a gift, executed a deed in which, through a mistake of the draughtsman, the premises were incorrectly described, and the name of the daughter's husband inserted instead of her own as grantee. No consideration was paid or promised for the conveyance, although a consideration was named in the deed. The deed was delivered to the daughter and duly recorded, and she was placed in possession. Afterward the husband executed a mortgage, containing the same erroneous description of the premises, to a bona fide mortgagee, who, upon foreclosure, purchased the premises and took a sheriff's deed containing the same erroneous description. Suit was brought by the purchaser to correct the description; whereupon A, having then first discovered the error in his former deed, executed and delivered to his daughter another voluntary deed, wherein she was named as grantee, and the premises correctly described. Held, 1. That the purchaser having acted in good faith, and without any notice of a defect in the husband's title, A was estopped from denying that the deed to the husband was made in good faith, or that the grantee was properly named therein; 2. That the daughter, being a voluntary grantee, had no claim, either under the original deed or under the one executed pending suit; 3. That the deed to the husband was not void for uncertainty in the description of the premises conveyed, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to have their deed reformed. German Mut. Ins. Co. v. Grim, 2 R. 341.

39. Purchaser of equitable title holds subject to equities.* — A purchaser of an equitable title takes it subject to all equities, though he purchases bona fide, for a valuable consideration, and without notice thereof. York v. McNutt, 67 D. 607. S. P., Polk v. Gallant, 34 D. 410; Craig v. Leiper, 24 D. 479.

Where A contracted to sell a house and lot to B, and C purchased of B all his right, etc., — held, that C, though a bona fide purchaser without notice, must take the property subject to all the equity existing between the original parties, A and B. Murray v. Gouverneur, 1 D. 177.

Where two persons have, in good faith, purchased at different times a tract of land from the same person, who holds only the equitable title thereto, the first purchaser has the best right, and must prevail, the equities being equal otherwise. Craig v. Leiper, 24 D. 479.

The assignee of a bond for the title takes it subject to defenses available against the original vendee, notwithstanding he purchased for a valuable consideration, and without notice of such defenses. York v. McNutt, 67 D. 607.

40. Rules of pleading and evidence respecting good faith and want of notice. — Where one pleads that he was a bona fide purchaser without notice, he must, to support that plea, allege and prove not only that he had no notice of the plaintiff's rights before and at the time of the purchase, but also that he actually paid the purchase-money before such notice. And the fact that the purchase-money was secured, but not paid before notice, will not sustain the plea. Jewett v. Palmer, 11 D. 401. S. P., Jackson v. McChesney, 17 D. 521; Doswell v. Buchanan, 23 D. 280; Grimstone v. Carter, 24 D. 230; Bush v. Bush, 51 D. 675; Everts v. Agnes, 65 D. 314; Warner v. Whittaker, 72 D. 65.

The rule in ejectment is different, because there the strict legal title must prevail. Jackson v. McChesney, 17 D. 521.

The defense of bona fide purchase for a valuable consideration, and without notice, can be set up by way of answer, against a plaintiff asserting a prior equitable claim, as well as by a plea in bar founded on such notice. Baynard v. Norris, 46 D. 647.

An answer setting up the defense of bona fide purchase must allege that, at the time of conveyance, the grantor or mortgagor was seised, or pretended to be seised, and was in possession of the premises conveyed. Id.

The plea of bona fide purchaser for value, without notice, must set forth the various requisites of the defense with convenient certainty, and must explicitly deny notice of the plaintiff's claim before execution of the conveyance and payment. Cummings v. Coleman, 62 D. 402. For a decree will be made against a purchaser for a valuable consideration who does not deny notice. Blake v. Jones, 21 D. 530.

To entitle a party to the protection which a court of equity extends to a subsequent bona fide purchaser, he must make a full statement of all the facts and circumstances of his case, so that the court may be able to do perfect equity between the parties. Everts v. Agnes, 65 D. 314.

* Purchaser of equitable title, whether and when entitled to protection as purchaser in good faith, see note, 97 D. 43-46.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

2. Actual and Constructive Notice.

41. What amounts to notice of equities, generally. — A parol sale of land, where the consideration is paid and possession delivered, is good as between the parties; but to make it valid as to a bona fide purchaser, there must be clear evidence of notice to him, either actual or legal. Legal notice exists only where there is a violent presumption of actual notice. Billington v. Welsh, 6 D. 406.

Notice given by the tenant in possession under the claimant of an equitable title is as available against the purchaser as if given by the claimant himself. Gallion v. McCaslin, 12 D. 208.

Actual notice of title can be given by him only in whom the title is vested. Woods v. Farmere, 32 D. 772.

Notice of the existence of a deed is not inferred from proof of general report in the neighborhood that the land had been sold, and the communication of such report to defendant; nor from an intimation by one not interested in the land that another title is outstanding; nor, generally, from information given by a person not interested in the property. Wilson v. McCullough, 62 D. 347.

The burden of proving actual notice of a deed or instrument affecting title to land, so as to affect a mortgagee, is upon the person asserting that such notice existed. Ib.

A purchase with notice of a secret trust must be made out by clear proof of actual notice, or of facts which put the party upon such inquiry as, if pursued with ordinary diligence, would have led him to the knowledge of such trust. Ib.

A mere rumor, or suspicion of defect in title to real estate, or an outstanding interest in a third person, will not operate as constructive notice to a purchaser thereof. Parker v. Kane, 65 D. 283.

A subsequent purchaser of lands is chargeable with notice of a decree in chancery by which the rights of a party to the lands are declared, and will hold them subject to such rights. Where, therefore, a tract of land held by a husband under a contract of purchase is set apart as alimony to his wife by a decree of divorce, a subsequent assignment of the contract by the husband and a conveyance from the original vendor to the assignee will not impair the rights of the wife; the grantee will hold nothing but the mere legal title, which he will in equity be bound to convey to her. Blue v. Blue, 87 D. 267.

Notice to a purchaser of an equitable interest need not come from the party interested, or his agent; for it is sufficient if it comes abunde, provided it is of a character likely to gain credit. Butcher v. Yocum, 100 D. 625.

Where a widow attempts to convey an equitable interest of an heir, his grandfather is a proper person to give notice of such equitable interest to the purchaser. Ib.

Defendant drew a deed, and as notary public took the acknowledgment of its execution, and also drew notes, executed by the grantee, for the unpaid purchase-money. Four years afterward he bought the premises. Held, that he was not chargeable by these facts with notice of the vendor's claim and lien for unpaid purchase-money. White v. Fisher, 40 R. 287.

42. Putting on inquiry. — Whatever will put a purchaser upon inquiry, and lead to knowledge, is notice. He is bound to make inquiry where there is anything that would lead a prudent man to make it, and he is therefore presumed to have known all that inquiry would have revealed to him. Gibson v. Winslow, 84 D. 552. S. P., Wilson v. McCullough, 62 D. 347; Parker v. Kane, 65 D. 283.

Information given to a purchaser which ought to put him on inquiry is sufficient notice in equity. Price v. McDonald, 54 D. 657.

Actual possession of a party is sufficient intimation of his rights to put a purchaser upon inquiry as to the nature of such possession, and where he neglects to make it, equity charges him with the consequences of a knowledge of the title. Hardy v. Summers, 32 D. 167; Baynard v. Norris, 46 D. 647; Dutton v. Warschauer, 82 D. 765.

The failure of a vendee to inform himself on the subject as to which the notice of sale was silent cannot be imputed as a wrong to the vendor, who neither said nor did anything to mislead him. Hendricks v. Stark, 93 D. 549.

A party will be charged with notice of the contents and effect of an instrument which actually affects the land conveyed to him, and which without doubt includes that land, if, after becoming aware of its existence, he fails to make suitable inquiry, notwithstanding that the party whose interest would prompt him to misrepresent should inform him that the encumbrance was paid off or discharged, without, however, furnishing any proof of that fact. Price v. McDonald, 54 D. 657.

43. Liens or equities apparent on face of deed. — Purchasers cannot claim to be innocent purchasers, so as to discharge the lien of a previous owner, who, by reference to their vendor's title deed, and by inquiry, could have learned that he purchased upon a credit, and that payment had not yet been made. Honore v. Bakewell, 43 D. 147.

A vendee of land is charged with notice of the facts recited in the deeds through which he claims, and is estopped to deny the same. Talbot v. Bell, 43 D. 126. Hence, if he acquires title under a deed which shows that the premises have been leased, and the rents assigned to a specified person for a certain period, he holds such premises under an obligation to pay such rents to such person. Childs v. Clark, 49 D. 164.

So a subsequent purchaser is affected with constructive notice of the amount of purchase-money remaining unpaid, where his deed provides he shall pay the amount then due by grantor. Manly v. Slason, 52 D. 60. And where a patent was issued to N., assignee of the administrator of H. R., deceased, — held, that such recital was sufficient to charge a subsequent purchaser with notice of the rights of the heirs of H. R. Reeder v. Barr, 22 D. 762.

44. — or shown by record. — Where land is claimed by entry from the state, every person dealing therewith is presumed to know the fact, whether it has or has not been granted by the state, because this is a matter of record, which ordinary diligence can ascertain, and which all interested are bound to know, if material, before they contract. Craig v. Leiper, 24 D. 479.

A purchaser for valuable consideration from a patentee in possession takes free of all equitable claim as against the patentee's title of which he had no actual notice, although documentary evidence of a mistake in the issue of a patent existed in the files and records of the general land-office, and the record in the proper register's office of the entry certificate was in the name of a party other than the patentee. Schnee v. Schnee, 99 D. 183.

No one will be presumed to have had knowledge of the registration of an instrument which could not prejudice him, as his claims are paramount thereto. Woods v. Farmere, 32 D. 772.

A purchaser of the legal title is not bound to take notice of a lien upon land recorded against former owner of the equitable title through whom the purchaser does not derive title, and whose name does not appear in connection with it. Harper v. Bibb, 69 D. 397.

A bona fide purchaser from a grantee in a state patent is not bound to take notice of a judgment lien on the land recorded against one who formerly held a certificate for the patent, and who, after the lien attached, conveyed to the purchaser's grantor, who obtained the state patent direct to himself. Id.

45. Notice from fact of land being adversely held. — Possession of lands puts a purchaser or creditor on inquiry as to the title of such person. Morgan v. Morgan, 21 D. 638. S. P., Grimstone v. Carter, 24 D. 230; Bryan v. Ramirez, 68 D. 340; Knox v. Thompson, 13 D. 246. And in the absence of any precaution of this kind, he takes the land subject to the equities of the person so in possession. McKee v. Wilcox, 83 D. 743.

One who purchases an estate knowing it to be in the possession of tenants is bound to inquire what estates they hold. James v. Morey, 14 D. 475; Chesterman v. Gardner, 9 D. 265; Hood v. Fahnestock, 44 D. 147.

Notice of a title imparted by possession is restricted by the registration by the tenant of an evidence of title that would justify his possession. Woods v. Farmere, 32 D. 772.

The grantee of land in another's possession is presumed to know all the circumstances relating to the title of the person in possession. Haddock v. Wilmarth, 20 D. 570; Knox v. Thompson, 13 D. 246.

The actual possession by a beneficiary of lands is notice of the trust to a purchaser. Pritchard v. Brown, 17 D. 431.

Actual possession of land by or under one holding a contract for conveyance thereof to him, where such possession is consistent with the contract, is sufficient to affect with notice a second purchaser from the original vendor. Kerr v. Day, 53 D. 526.

The possession of real estate, open and notorious, by one holding an unrecorded deed, is evidence of notice to a subsequent purchaser, of the first grantee's title; but the possession must exist at the time of the acquisition of title or deed of the subsequent grantee from the common grantor. Hunter v. Watson, 73 D. 543.

Undisturbed possession by the equitable owner has generally been considered legal notice; but it must be a clear, unequivocal possession. Accordingly, where A bought by parol from B a corner of B's tract, paid for it, was put into possession, and had buildings erected, but at the same time had no survey of the part, or other admeasurement to reduce it to a certainty, and on B's own part there was a forge, dwelling-house, grist and saw mill, and other buildings, which, together with A's buildings, might be taken as one establishment, the possession of A was held not to be legal notice of his title to a purchaser at sheriff's sale, under a judgment against B. Billington v. Welsh, 6 D. 406.

Notice to subsequent purchasers of the grantor's land of the grant of a right to erect a dam will not be conclusively presumed from the erection and occupation of the dam by the grantee for six months in the year, and by a stranger for the other six months. Boynston v. Rees, 19 D. 326.

A purchaser under a judgment will not be presumed to have examined the register's office for the debtor's will, and cannot contend that as the terms of the will justified the tenant's possession, that possession was evidence of no further title. Woods v. Farmere, 32 D. 772.

Registration by an executor of a will in which he is a devisee will not operate to restrict the notice of title conveyed by his possession of the land devised, and to which he has claims paramount to those of the devisee. Id.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

Where an origin of possession is shown during an ancestor's lifetime, no presumption of seisin by descent can be made, in order to explain the possession. Ib.

Constructive notice of an unrecorded lease for life is not given by the fact that the lessee and lessor are both in possession of the premises, so as to take priority over a subsequent mortgage by the lessor to a mortgagee in good faith, where there was the same possession by the lessor and lessee before the lease. Bell v. Twilight, 45 D. 367.

46. Effect of notice. — A purchaser, with notice at any time before he is clothed with the legal title of an outstanding equity, is bound by such prior equity. Halley v. Oldham, 41 D. 262; Williamson v. Branch Bank, 42 D. 617; Gallion v. McCaslin, 12 D. 208; and this notice may be actual personal notice, or it may arise from open and notorious possession of the land by the vendee. Filley v. Duncan, 93 D. 337.

When a defendant purchases land with notice of the plaintiff's equitable title, and that his vendor's only interest arises from his having paid part of the consideration of the contract, through which the plaintiff derives title, he will be compelled to convey to the plaintiff on repayment of that sum. Pugh v. Bell, 15 D. 142.

A purchase from infant plaintiffs avails nothing. Ib.

Actual notice of an unregistered conveyance renders it impossible for a subsequent purchaser to protect himself against it. Tuttle v. Jackson, 21 D. 306.

Notice prior to the payment of the purchase-money will bind a party as effectually as if received before purchase. Price v. McDonald, 54 D. 657.

A vendee of land who purchases with a knowledge of an existing right of way over it is bound to perform his engagement to pay the purchase-money, when the state of facts continues to be the same as it was at the date of the purchase. Wilson v. Cochran, 86 D. 574.

A purchaser of land for a valuable consideration, with notice of a prior deed for same land made by the grantor during infancy, but without notice of a subsequent ratification of that deed, will hold the land against the prior grantee. Black v. Hills, 87 D. 224.

One has as perfect a legal right to purchase land which his grantor has conveyed during minority as to purchase land that has never been conveyed at all; and he is not to be denied the position of an innocent purchaser because he has notice of the deed made during minority. Ib.

A grantee who takes land in payment of a precedent debt, and with full knowledge of the circumstances under which his grantor acquired title, takes it subject to all the equities which existed against it in the hands of the grantor. Tapley v. Tapley, 88 D. 76.

A subvendee taking the legal title to land, charged with a vendor's lien, and with notice, accepts the title cum onere, and is in no better position than the original purchaser, and whatever is enough to excite attention, or put such subvendee on inquiry, is notice. Parker v. Foy, 5 R. 484. S. P., Converse v. Blumrich, 90 D. 230.

III. THE VENDOR'S LIEN.

47. Origin and nature of the lien.*

—The vendor's lien was adopted by the courts of equity from the civil law. Wellborn v. Williams, 52 D. 427. Lupin v. Marie, 21 D. 256.

The vendor and vendee have mutual liens, the former for the purchase-money still due, and the latter for that which has been paid, in case it is to be restored. Farmer v. Samuel, 14 D. 106.

The estate is security for purchase-money to be paid until an actual conveyance. Winborn v. Gorrell, 40 D. 456.

On a conveyance of land by deed, a lien arises in equity for the unpaid purchase-money. Gee v. McMillan, 58 R. 315; if the title is still in the vendee. Dunlap v. Burnett, 45 D. 269.

By the civil law, a vendor has a lien upon the land sold, for any part of the purchase-money remaining unpaid, and this without any agreement. Briscoe v. Bronaugh, 46 D. 108.

A vendor's lien is founded upon an implied trust between the vendor and purchaser. The trust attaches to the land, and follows it into the hands of a subsequent purchaser with notice. Ib.

A vendor's lien attaches where a purchaser gives bonds and personal security for purchase-money, but does not take a conveyance, nor pay the money. Clower v. Rawlings, 47 D. 108.

A vendor of real estate has a lien for unpaid purchase-money against the vendee, his heirs, privies in estate, volunteers, and all subsequent purchasers with notice that the purchase-money remains unpaid. Prima facie, such lien exists without special agreement for that purpose; and it devolves upon the purchaser to show that the lien was not intended to be resumed. Ellis v. Temple, 94 D. 200.

A vendor's lien does not exist, in a proper sense, until established by a decree of a court of equity. Wellborn v. Williams, 52 D. 427.

The doctrine of an equitable lien for purchase-money of land should not be extended beyond its proper limits, and ought not to be applied where it is evident that the parties never intended to apply it. Moore v. Holcombe, 24 D. 683.

* See note on the existence, waiver, and assignability of vendor's lien, 28 D. 199-201.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

Where an agreement to indemnify is part of the consideration for a sale of land, no lien attaches before a breach of the covenant to indemnify. Michigan State Bank v. Hastings, 41 D. 549.

A vendor's lien for the unpaid purchase-money of land which he has given a bond to convey overreaches the lien of any subsequent judgment creditor of or purchaser from the vendee. Gillespie v. Bradford, 27 D. 494.

The existence of the vendor's lien on land for the unpaid purchase-money, even as between vendor and vendee, is, in North Carolina, not yet settled. Johnson v. Cawthorn, 27 D. 250.

Such a lien certainly does not exist as against creditors of the vendee, enforcing their debts, nor as against purchasers at execution sale, who bought with notice that the purchase price of the land was not yet paid. Ib.

The holder of a title bond can resist recovery by a vendor only by bill to redeem the premises, the vendor's lien for the unpaid purchase-money being in the nature of a mortgage. Chapman v. Glassell, 48 D. 41.

A vendor's lien differs from an equitable mortgage, the latter being founded upon an implied contract, the former not. Wellborn v. Williams, 52 D. 427.

A lien for unpaid purchase-money on lands, legal title being reserved in vendor, has same legal effect as a deed and mortgage back to secure such delinquency; and is unlike the equitable lien of vendor who has conveyed legal title and acknowledged receipt of purchase-money, having none of its odious characteristics. Moore v. Anders, 60 D. 551.

A vendor's lien is upon whole and every part of land. If a part be lost by paramount title, so as to entitle the vendee to an abatement, the residue of the land is liable for the balance. Mims v. Lockett, 68 D. 521.

A vendor's lien is upon land, especially when sold with notice, and not upon the proceeds. Ib.

A vendor's lien, after absolute conveyance, is not a specific, absolute charge upon property, but only an equitable right of the vendor to resort to it in case the purchase-money is not paid. Baum v. Grigsby, 81 D. 153.

A distinction between the lien of vendor after absolute conveyance, and the lien of vendor when contract of sale is unexecuted, stated. Ib.

To create a vendor's lien, there must be a debt for unpaid purchase-money in a fixed amount, due directly to the vendor. If the vendee's obligation consists of a collateral covenant, or is for the discharge of the liability of a third person, and the conveyance is absolute, no lien is retained. Harvey v. Kelly, 93 D. 267.

An express reservation of a vendor's lien in a deed amounts to an equitable mortgage; and the rights of the vendor and vendee depend on their contract, and not on a mere implication of law. Ib.

Where an agreement is made for the sale of real estate, the purchaser to have immediate possession, but the title to remain in the vendor till the money is paid, an express lien on the land is thereby created in favor of the vendor. Layow v. Badollet, 12 D. 258.

There is no distinction between a legal title conveyed to secure the payment of the purchase-money and a legal title retained to secure it. In both cases, equity considers the estate only security for the debt, upon the discharge of which the debtor is entitled to a conveyance in the one instance and a reconveyance in the other. Ellis v. Temple, 94 D. 200.

A vendor's lien upon land for its purchase-money is not impaired because the obligation taken for its payment includes the price of personal property sold at the same time, when the amount to be paid for the land can be ascertained by proof. Russell v. McCormick, 6 R. 707.

The equitable lien of the vendor of land for unpaid purchase-money is subordinate to a special lien acquired by a creditor of the vendee, whether with or without notice, before proceedings are instituted to enforce such equitable lien. Rain v. Inman, 19 R. 577.

48. Who may claim a lien. — Where the vendee assigns the contract, and the assignee takes possession of the land, the vendor, though he has no right of action against the assignee for the purchase-money, may, however, by virtue of his lien on the land, call upon him to pay the money, or to surrender the land, or to have it sold in satisfaction of the lien. Champion v. Brown, 10 D. 343.

A vendor retains no lien for the purchase-money on the claim of his vendee, where, after the sale to him, the vendor asserts title in himself, and conveys the same land to another. Blight v. Banks, 17 D. 136.

A vendor has a lien on real estate, for the purchase-money, even after delivery of possession, unless he has taken independent security or the land has passed to a bona fide purchaser. Lupin v. Marie, 21 D. 256.

The assignee of a note given in part consideration for the purchase price of land, to secure the payment of which the vendor reserved the legal title in himself, is entitled to have his debt satisfied out of the land. Graham v. McCampbell, 33 D. 126.

No distinction can be drawn between the cases of a legal title conveyed and a legal title reserved, to secure the payment of a debt. Ib.

Where a deed is not to be executed till payment is made in a contract for the sale of real and personal estate, the vendor has a lien on all the property for the purchase price. Clarks v. Curtis, 37 D. 625.

A vendor may follow personalty into hands of third persons to whom the vendee has sold it pendente lite, in such a case. Ib.

A vendor of real estate retains a lien on the same, for the unpaid purchase-money, unless he has expressly or impliedly waived it, which may be enforced against the vendee and all persons claiming under him with notice, although a deed has been executed to the vendee conveying the legal title. Hall v. Click, 39 D. 327.

No lien arises for the purchase-money when loaned by a third person to the purchaser of land; nor is such person privy to the sale between the vendor and purchaser. Stansell v. Roberts, 42 D. 193.

An order drawn by a vendor on a vendee indebted for purchase-money may, in equity, be treated as a transfer of so much purchase-money, and the drawer may enforce a vendor's lien therefor. Knisely v. Williams, 46 D. 193.

Where a parol sale of lands passes a legal and valid title, the want of a writing does not affect the right of the vendor to retain a lien upon the land to secure the payment of the purchase-money. Briscoe v. Bronaugh, 46 D. 109.

A party who has parted with his lien for the purchase price of real estate and afterwards comes into the possession of the legal title to the same land as a trustee, under a trust deed which provides for a certain disposition of the land, cannot revive his lien and hold said land subject to it. Follett v. Reese, 55 D. 472.

A vendor has a lien on land sold for the payment of the purchase-money, even where the title has been fully conveyed, if he has taken no security for the payment; and the rights of a vendor who has not conveyed the title cannot be of less efficacy. Salmon v. Hoffman, 56 D. 322.

A vendor's position is analogous to that of mortgagee, where he has not conveyed the title to the land sold. Ib.

A vendor, in a contract for the sale of land, by expressly reserving the legal title and giving bond or covenant for title on the payment of purchase-money, retains a lien for unpaid purchase-money, of which subsequent purchasers or encumbrancers claiming under vendee must take notice. Moore v. Anders, 60 D. 551.

One who contracts to purchase property, giving to his vendor a mortgage upon other property to secure the payment of the purchase-money, but who by a subsequent agreement secures the substitution of another in his place as purchaser, by the terms of which the mortgage remains security for the payment of the purchase-money by the substitute, is neither a vendor of nor a co-purchaser with the substitute, and obtains, by reason of the mortgage, neither a joint interest with the substitute in the property purchased nor a lien upon it, especially when by the agreement of substitution the title was to vest absolutely in the substitute. Schroeder v. Paterson, 70 D. 163.

A lease for a term of years is personal property, and the vendor of such property has no general lien upon it for unpaid purchase-money after he has parted with the possession. Cade v. Brownlee, 77 D. 95.

An equitable lien for the purchase-money of land is not created by a mere recital on the face of the deed that the purchase-money remains unpaid and is to be paid annually. And where no intention to charge the purchase-money as a lien on the land is expressed in the deed, the law will not imply such an intention, and no lien is created as against a purchaser thereof at sheriff's sale as the property of the grantee. Hiester v. Green, 86 D. 569.

A grantor is defined to be one who gives, bestows, or concedes a thing, and in legal parlance is understood to be one who executes a deed or conveyance, and may be distinguished from a vendor, who is a seller, or a person who disposes of a thing for money. Russell v. Watt, 93 D. 270.

A vendor's lien may be enforced in favor of one who is not grantor of the land, and though the deed to the vendee is executed by a third person. Thus the owner of land made a parol gift of it to his daughter. She sold the land to another, taking his notes for the price. The grantor executed the conveyance to the vendee, and the price not having been paid, the vendee (the daughter) was permitted to enforce her lien therefor. Ib.

Plaintiff's land was sold by the sheriff, at auction, under an execution, and bought by defendant, who bid more than enough to satisfy the execution. Held, that plaintiff had a lien on the land for the excess of the purchase-money. Yarborough v. Wood, 19 R. 44.

In Massachusetts the vendor of real estate, by an absolute deed, has no lien thereon for the unpaid purchase-money, in the absence of a written agreement of the parties to that effect. Ahrend v. Odiorne, 19 R. 449.

49. Against whom a lien may be claimed. — 1. In general. — A vendor has a lien upon real estate for the purchase-money remaining unpaid, and it subsists against the vendee, his heirs, and all others who take under him with notice. Clower v. Rawlings, 47 D. 108; Manly v. Slason, 52 D. 60; Walton v. Hargroves, 97 D. 429. This lien, however, does not exist against a bona fide purchaser without notice, nor prevail against a creditor who may have acquired a judgment or execution lien upon the property before a bill has been filed by the vendor to enforce his lien. Lincoln v. Purcell, 73 D. 196.

A specific lien, or a lien created by contract, will be operative against the creditors, bona fide purchasers, and all other persons, without regard to actual notice, where the conveyance reserving the lien has been properly recorded. Ib.

Coverture is not a bar to a suit to enforce a vendor's lien on real estate. Perry v. Roberts, 95 D. 689; Pylant v. Reeves, 25 R. 605; Kent v. Gerhard, 34 R. 612.

A vendor's lien will prevail against a vendee, and against volunteers and purchasers under him, with notice, or having an equitable title only; against assignees claiming by a general assignment made under bankrupt or insolvent laws, or by a failing debtor for the benefit of creditors; against the claim of dower by the wife of the purchaser; and against a judgment creditor of the vendee. Walton v. Hargroves, 97 D. 429.

2. Subsequent creditors of vendee. — A vendor's lien may be asserted against judgment creditors of the purchaser, but not against bona fide purchasers from the latter without notice. Aldridge v. Dunn, 41 D. 224.

Where an absolute conveyance is made of land, a receipt given for the purchase-money and possession delivered to the vendee, part of the purchase-money being paid and the bond of the purchaser, with a surety taken for the residue, the vendor has not a lien for the residue against judgment creditors of the vendee whose judgments are subsequent to the conveyance, although they may have had notice that a portion of the purchase-money still remained unpaid. Kauffelt v. Bower, 10 D. 428.

A vendor's lien cannot be allowed to prevail against the creditors of the vendee who have subsequently acquired a lien upon the estate, with or without notice, either by judgment or in any other mode, before a bill has been filed by the vendor to assert his lien. The lien, though it relates to the date of the conveyance, does not acquire the character or effect of a specific lien until the filing of a bill to enforce it. As between the vendor and subsequent lien creditors of the vendee, it becomes a question of priority of liens, irrespective of notice and all other considerations. Ellis v. Temple, 94 D. 200.

3. Subsequent purchasers from vendee. — A vendor's lien cannot be enforced against a bona fide purchaser without notice. Kilpatrick v. Kilpatrick, 55 D. 79; Blight v. Banks, 17 D. 136.

A lien of vendor is implied from the supposed intentions of the parties, and so long as it is confined to the parties and to those claiming under them, with notice, it is not liable to objection; but if a vendor conveys the land to the vendee in such a manner as to make him appear to be the complete owner with full power to sell, he will not be permitted to use his secret lien to the injury of those who, in ignorance of it, for a valuable consideration, have acquired either the legal title or an equitable encumbrance. Moore v. Holcombe, 24 D. 633.

The assignees are necessary parties to a bill brought by such original vendor to subject such lands to sale under the equitable lien claimed by him. Ib.

A subsequent purchaser of land subject to a vendor's lien is bound by an implied as well as actual notice thereof; and he is chargeable with notice of such lien, if the conveyance to him refers to the deed to his vendor, which, though unrecorded, recites a part of the consideration as "secured to be paid" at a future time, these words not necessarily or properly importing personal security. Johnston v. Gwathmey, 14 D. 135.

A vendor discharging the vendee from liability for part of land conveyed, and taking the promise and note of a subvendee in lieu thereof, has in equity a lien on the part so purchased by such subvendee. Honore v. Bakewell, 43 D. 147.

Where a vendor retains the legal title, the land is liable in the hands of subpurchasers for the balance of the purchase-money unpaid. Armstrong v. Mudd, 50 D. 545.

A vendor's lien cannot be enforced against purchaser at execution sale of the land against the vendee, if he purchases for a valuable consideration and without notice, semble. Kilpatrick v. Kilpatrick, 55 D. 79.

On execution sale of land which the judgment debtor holds by title bond, from the execution creditor, nothing passes but the equity of redemption, and the purchaser takes the land subject to the vendor's lien. Rice v. Wilburn, 25 R. 549.

A presumption of law is, that the purchaser of land upon which a specific lien is reserved holds under and consistent with the lien until the contrary is shown by him. Lincoln v. Purcell, 73 D. 196.

Where the vendor intrusts to the vendee, to be delivered for record, a mortgage given by the vendee to secure the payment of the purchase-money, and the latter, before recording the mortgage, sells the land to bona fide purchasers by written contracts merely executory, giving to such purchasers no present legal interest or right of possession, and the mortgage is afterwards recorded before the mortgagee has any notice of the rights of such purchasers, he has an equity superior to theirs, and may subject the land to the payment of his debt. Antetel v. Converse, 91 D. 115.

To protect a purchaser from a vendor against the lien of a prior vendor, he must have purchased and paid the price in full, without notice of the lien; and he must make this defense either by plea or specific answer. Ellis v. Temple, 94 D. 200.

Purchasers and mortgagees of an equitable estate take the same subject to the vendor's equity; and purchasers and mortgagees of the legal estate, with notice of the lien before paying the purchase-money, will be postponed to the vendor's equity. Walton v. Hargroves, 97 D. 429.

T., the owner of land, being indebted to G., to secure the debt, gave the latter the sale of the land. He sold to B., to whom T. executed a deed of conveyance, B. giving his note to G. for the purchase-money, and it was agreed that the vendor's lien for the purchase-money should exist. Held, that the vendor's lien existed in favor of G. against a vendee from B. of the land, with notice. Perkins v. Gibson, 24 R. 644.

50. Transfer of the lien. — The equitable lien which the vendor of land retains, after an absolute conveyance, for the unpaid purchase-money, is not assignable. Baum v. Grigsby, 81 D. 153; Richards v. Leaming, 81 D. 239; Hecht v. Spears, 11 R. 784.

The lien created in favor of the vendor when the title is not to pass until the price is paid is not merely personal to him, but may be assigned, and the assignment will be supported in equity to promote the ends of justice. Lagow v. Badollet, 12 D. 258.

The vendor in such a case being a mere trustee of the legal title for the purpose of conveying to the purchaser, on payment of the purchase-money, a purchaser at an execution sale of the vendor's interest in the land, having knowledge of the agreement, takes subject to the trust, and will be compelled to execute it. Ib.

By the transfer of a note given for the purchase price of real estate, the lien which the vendor has upon the land passes with it, as the note is the principal thing, and the lien is but an incident to secure its payment. Conner v. Banks, 52 D. 209; Johnston v. Gwathmey, 14 D. 135; Kern v. Hazlerigg, 71 D. 360; Griffin v. Camack, 76 D. 344; Robinson v. Harbour, 97 D. 501; Stevens v. Chadwick, 15 R. 348; Sloan v. Campbell, 36 R. 493. Contra, see Wellborn v. Williams, 52 D. 427. And it makes no difference that the payor is under the disability of coverture at the time of the execution of the note. Perry v. Roberts, 95 D. 689.

The assignee of notes given for the purchase-money of land has no lien. Jackman v. Hallock, 13 D. 627; Briggs v. Hill, 38 D. 441; Wellborn v. Williams, 52 D. 427; Richards v. Leaming, 81 D. 239; Simpson v. Montgomery, 99 D. 228.

The assignee of a note given for the purchase price of land, who takes it without recourse against the assignor, cannot enforce the lien of the vendor. Hall v. Click, 39 D. 327; Schnebly v. Ragan, 28 D. 195.

The assignee does not waive his lien by the mere fact that he may also have a lien upon land sold to the assignor. Johnston v. Gwathmey, 14 D. 135.

The fact that notes thus assigned are identical in times of payment, with installments of purchase-money recited in the deed to be still due, is sufficient, prima facie, to show that they were part of the consideration of such deed. Ib.

The assignment of a note for the purchase-money for land, secured by a lien expressly reserved by contract for the vendor's benefit, under bond for title on payment of purchase-money, carries with it vendor's lien by way of mortgage security, as an incident to the debt, and may be so enforced by the assignee. Moore v. Anders, 60 D. 551.

The vendor's lien may be enforced by a transferee of a note payable to bearer, given for the purchase price of land, where the lien is reserved in the note. Murray v. Able, 70 D. 330.

The vendor's lien does not exist in favor of an assignee of a note for purchase-money assigned after conveyance of the land to the wife of the vendee. Massey v. Gorton, 90 D. 287.

51. Extinguishment of the lien. — Where an equitable lien for the purchase-money exists on lands which the grantee conveys to another, who is ignorant of the existence of the lien, and who gives to his grantor bonds for the purchase-money, which the latter assigns to third persons who take them without notice, and for a valuable consideration, such lien is lost, and the unpaid purchase-money in the hands of the obligor belongs to the assignees, and not to the original vendor. Moore v. Holcombe, 24 D. 683.

As against a remote vendee, a vendor's lien upon land does not subsist after the statute of limitations has run against a note given for the purchase-money, and the first vendee cannot extend the lien by payments upon the note. Tate v. Hawkins, 50 R. 181.

A vendor's lien is not discharged by the death of the vendor and the consequent transfer of the debt to his heir or devisee. Tiernan v. Beam, 15 D. 557; nor by a judgment of a county court allowing and ordering the payment of a claim against an estate. Hays v. Horine, 79 D. 518; nor because the statute of limitations has barred an action on notes given therefor. Bizzell v. Nix, 31 R. 38.

The vendor's right to file a bill to subject the land to sale for the payment of purchase-money in arrear, where he has not parted with the title, cannot be affected by the lapse of any time short of that requisite to raise the presumption of payment. Hanna v. Wilson, 46 D. 190.

Part payment does not extinguish the vendor's lien. It still remains a security for the balance unpaid. Hays v. Horine, 79 D. 518.

Where the lien once existed, it still continues, unless intentionally displaced or waived by consent of the parties. Ib.

On a purchase of land, the vendee gave his bank check for the amount of a cash payment. The check was not presented until four weeks afterward, and there were no funds to pay it, the vendee having withdrawn them two weeks previously. Held, that the vendor's lien was not lost. Mad-den v. Barnes, 30 R. 703.

52. Foreclosure of the lien.—1. Right of action—Jurisdiction—Parties.—A vendor may have recourse in equity to his lien after he has unsuccessfully attempted to collect the debt at law. Aldridge v. Dunn, 41 D. 224.

Equity has jurisdiction to enforce a vendor's lien, and it is not necessary that a judgment should be obtained before application by the vendor to the chancellor for the enforcement of his lien. Armstrong v. Mudd, 50 D. 545.

The lien may be enforced in an action on a note for the purchase price of land, where the code abolishes distinctions between actions at law and suits in equity. Kern v. Haulerigg, 71 D. 360.

The vendor's lien for purchase-money, both as to the legal and equitable claim, may be enforced in one proceeding, under the Indiana statute. But if the vendor see fit to first resort to his legal claim, he does not thereby waive his right ultimately, if necessary, to resort to his equitable claim. Dibblee v. Mitchell, 77 D. 99.

The vendor may file a bill to enforce his lien upon failure of vendee to pay, although the price was to be paid in specific articles, and not in money. Harvey v. Kelly, 93 D. 267.

A vendor's lien cannot be enforced in a bill brought by himself to the use of the assignees of a note taken for the purchase-money, and assigned to them as collateral security for another debt. They should be made parties to the bill. Plowman v. Riddle, 48 D. 92.

Where a transfer of land is made pending a suit to enforce a vendor's lien thereon, it is not necessary to make the vendee a party, for he is affected with notice of the lis pendens, and his interest is subject to the judgment rendered therein. Kern v. Haulerigg, 71 D. 360.

2. Pleading—Evidence—Defenses.—The vendor's lien is limited to the amount expressed in the deed as against a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice from the vendee; and the grantor as against him cannot be permitted to aver or prove a different consideration. Kilpatrick v. Kilpatrick, 55 D. 79.

A vendee under an executory contract of sale does not hold adversely to the vendor, and he cannot invoke the analogy of the statute of limitations, in the absence of a holding positively hostile to the vendor, to defeat a bill to enforce the vendor's lien. The same rule applies between vendor and vendee as between mortgagee and mortgagor. Relfe v. Relfe, 73 D. 467.

In all cases where the vendee gives the vendor his notes to secure the payment of the purchase-money, payable at different times, and takes from the vendor a bond for title when the money or last installment is paid, performance is a condition precedent to the right of recovery; and the assignee of the vendor cannot proceed in equity to enforce the vendor's lien against the land without averring and proving a performance of the covenant on the part of the vendor, or tender or offer to perform, before the filing of the bill. The averment in the bill that the assignor of the note is ready and willing to execute a deed on payment of the purchase-money is not sufficient to sustain it. Robinson v. Harbour, 97 D. 501.

3. Judgment, and how enforced.—Where all the lands subject to the lien are in the same situation, the different parts sold must contribute ratably to the discharge of the lien. Blight v. Banks, 17 D. 136.

Where a portion of the land remains unsold in the hands of the original purchaser, that part must first be subjected to the discharge of the lien, and if it be sufficient for that purpose, the portion sold, even in the hands of a purchaser with notice, will be held free from the lien. Ib.

A judgment directing a sale of real estate on a vendor's lien, there being no averment of insolvency or a want of other property, is erroneous. Elyer v. Crabbs, 56 D. 711.

A decree by a court of equity for a deed from one defendant to another, in a suit to enforce a vendor's lien, is not matter of which the plaintiff can complain, where the court also decided that he had no lien or right in the premises, and decreed costs against him. Mann v. Lewis, 100 D. 747.

Money in court arising from a sale of lands under execution is subject to a grantor's lien before the sale is confirmed. Boos v. Ewing, 49 D. 478.

Such lien will be protected although the purchase-money is not yet due, and although it may in the end result to the benefit of one of two tenants in common to whom the land was conveyed. Ib.

4. Personal judgment.—The existence of a valid defense at law is no ground for a decree in personam for the unsatisfied balance due after exhausting the proceeds of the land upon a bill to enforce a vendor's lien. Cobb v. Duke, 72 D. 157.

Equity cannot render a decree in personam for the unsatisfied balance, in addition to a decree of sale of the land, upon a bill to enforce a vendor's lien, the rule being the same as upon a bill to foreclose a mortgage. Ib.

Equity will not render a decree in personam for an unsatisfied balance remaining after exhausting the proceeds of the land, on the ground that there are doubts or embarrassments as to the title. Ib.

58. Waiver of the lien.—1. *General principles.—A vendor's lien may be waived, either expressly or by implication. Mims v. Lockett, 68 D. 521.

Prima facie, a vendor's lien exists, and it lies on the vendee, or a purchaser from him with notice, to show that the vendor agreed to waive it. Briscoe v. Bronaugh, 46 D. 108; Hays v. Horine, 79 D. 518.

2. What amounts to a waiver.—Where encumbrances are created on land subsequent to agreement for the sale thereof, the agreement cannot be enforced while the encumbrances burden the land. Withers v. Baird, 32 D. 754.

Failure to assert a vendor's lien for three years furnishes a strong presumption that it is considered waived. Conover v. Warren, 41 D. 196.

No waiver arises from an extension of credit to the purchaser. Aldridge v. Dunn, 41 D. 224.

The vendor's lien is not waived: By a stipulation in the agreement that the purchaser is not to remove a certain steam-engine on the land until the money is paid, though this constitutes an express lien on the engine. Lagow v. Badollet, 12 D. 258.

By making a conveyance and taking a note or bond, with personal security for the balance due. Tiernan v. Beam, 15 D. 557.

By taking the purchaser's note for the amount due. Aldridge v. Dunn, 41 D. 224; Manly v. Slason, 52 D. 60; Baum v. Grigsby, 81 D. 153.

By acceptance of a check upon the bank for the purchase-money which was never presented or paid, but subsequently surrendered and canceled, and a note for the amount, antedated to the same date, taken in its stead. Honore v. Bakewell, 43 D. 147.

By the taking of an order on a third person for the amount of the purchase-money, if such order is never accepted by such third person; and the vendor may, on the refusal of such third person to accept the order, at once proceed on the bond for the purchase money, to recover the amount due. Knisely v. Williams, 46 D. 193.

By the vendor taking a note for the purchase-money, with the privilege of allowing the vendee to pay it in leather. Plowman v. Riddle, 48 D. 92.

By the fact that the vendor transfers, as collateral security for another debt, a note which he has taken for the purchase-money. Ib.

By taking a mortgage on the land conveyed, as security, if the intention was to rely upon the land solely for payment; and such lien, therefore, takes precedence over the lien of judgment creditors, obtained after the taking and before the recording of the mortgage. Boos v. Bwing, 49 D. 478.

By extending time of payment of a note given for the purchase price of real estate by taking a new note in its stead. Conner v. Banks, 52 D. 209; Mims v. Lockett, 68 D. 521.

By vendor's acceptance of a mortgage for the purchase price, which turns out to be forged. Fouch v. Wilson, 28 R. 651.

3. Effect of taking a new or distinct security.—The taking of new and distinct security for the payment of the purchase-money waives the lien that a vendor has upon the property sold for the payment of the purchase price. White v. Dougherty, 17 D. 802. S. P., Blight v. Banks, 17 D. 136; Follett v. Reese, 55 D. 472.

A vendor's lien on land is presumed to be waived by his taking other security, such as a note for the purchase-money, indorsed by a third person, a mortgage on other property, a pledge of goods, or the personal responsibility of a third person, and can be repelled only by direct proof to the contrary. Marshall v. Christmas, 39 D. 199. S. P., Conover v. Warren, 41 D. 196; Dibbles v. Mitchell, 77 D. 99; Kendrick v. Eggleston, 41 R. 90.

The taking by the vendor of lands, of the note of the purchaser, with a third person as surety thereon, is prima facie evidence of a waiver of the vendor's lien for the purchase-money, but it may be rebutted by satisfactory proof of an express agreement that the lien should be retained. Fonda v. Jones, 2 R. 669. S. P., Willis v. Gay, 26 R. 328.

A vendor's implied lien for purchase-money is merged or waived, in general, by taking a mortgage as security. Burnap v. Cook, 85 D. 507. But compare Anketel v. Converse, 91 D. 115.

The lien does not attach, where the vendor took personal security, and gave a conveyance after two years for the purpose of allowing the vendee to raise money by mortgaging the land, the making of the conveyance being an abandonment of the equitable lien. Clower v. Rawlings, 47 D. 108.

Whether acceptance of a renewed note for the purchase-money, and which includes other considerations, is an implied waiver of vendor's lien, is a question of law for the court, and not one of fact for the jury. Mims v. Lockett, 68 D. 521.

The lien is waived by the taking of any security, either personal or material; or by the neglect to enforce the lien for a considerable time, though short of the time prescribed by the statute of limitations. Richards v. Leaming, 81 L. 239.

Where one conveys land to a married woman, and takes a deed of other lands from her husband, with covenants of warranty, in part payment, and the husband's promissory note for the balance, he waives his lien as vendor and can resort only to the husband for payment. Andrus v. Coleman, 25 R. 289.

IV. REMEDIES.

1. Of the Vendor.

54. In general. — The vendor may elect to treat either as a trespasser or as a tenant at will one who with his consent enters upon land under a contract of purchase, but fails to pay as he agreed; and he may maintain against him either trespass or assumpsit for use and occupation. Woodbury v. Woodbury, 90 D. 555. Contra, see Smith v. Stewart, 5 D. 186.

55. Right to sue for purchase-money. — A parol promise by a purchaser of land to pay for the same, made during the negotiation for its purchase, is merged in the note given for the consideration at the time of the agreement, and the holder of the note cannot waive it, and sue on the original promise. Wheelock v. Freeman, 23 D. 674.

The vendor may maintain his action for the purchase-money, without having executed a conveyance of the land, or offered to do so, when the promise to pay is independent of the covenant to make title. Hageman v. Sharkey, 29 D. 627.

A lien created by the vendor after the agreement to convey will not prevent him from enforcing payment of the purchase-money, if he gives adequate security for the indemnification of the vendee. Thompson v. Carpenter, 45 D. 681.

The vendor may sue the vendee on a note for the purchase-money, though the latter yielded possession to a purchaser at a sheriff's sale under a judgment against the vendor, older than the deed of the vendee, unless actual eviction is shown. Dennis v. Heath, 49 D. 51.

The vendee may be decreed to pay the purchase-money, though no deed be decreed from the vendor to the vendee, when the vendor has only an equitable title in the property, and has sold his interest, authorizing and empowering the vendee to acquire the legal title. Bailey v. James, 62 D. 659.

A vendor who waives his right to receive the purchase-money in installments, as prescribed by the contract, and allows the whole to remain unpaid until the last installment falls due, must then tender a conveyance, before he can sue the purchaser for the price. Beecher v. Conradt, 64 D. 535.

A vendor expressly covenanting to furnish the vendee a complete chain of title for each of several parcels of land, and failing so to do, the vendee not to be bound to pay for those portions of the land for which he might be unable to furnish such title, is estopped from saying that his vendee has not been injured by his failure to perform such covenant; nor can he be heard to say that the title of his vendee has become invulnerable by lapse of time, or been perfected in any other manner. Stillman v. Canales, 78 D. 530.

A sale of land by the vendee, with or without warranty, is not a waiver of an express condition, upon the performance of which alone the vendor was entitled to claim the payment of the purchase-money. Ib.

A vendor of land, under executory contract, cannot recover the balance of the purchase-money from the vendee, where he recovers judgment against the vendee, on the vendee's failure to pay the first installment due, and becomes the purchaser of the land at sheriff's sale. Graff v. Kelly, 82 D. 580.

If the owner of a house and land agrees to sell and convey it upon the payment of a certain price which the purchaser agrees to pay, and before full payment the house is destroyed by accidental fire, so that the vendor cannot perform the agreement on his part, he cannot recover or retain any part of the purchase-money. Wells v. Calnan, 9 R. 65.

Therefore, where plaintiff contracted to sell and convey to defendant a farm having buildings thereon, and to deliver a deed in "fee-simple of said premises," upon the payment by defendant, on a day named, of the price stipulated, and before the day named and the tender by plaintiff of the deed the buildings on the premises were burned, and the value of the premises greatly reduced thereby, — held, that plaintiff could not maintain an action upon the contract. Ib.

56. Matters of defense. — 1. In general. — The rule of caveat emptor applies to a purchase of real estate after the conveyance has been executed and received; and the purchaser cannot recover back the purchase-money, if paid, nor resist an action therefor, if unpaid, unless as a consequence of covenants contained in his deed. Cullum v. Branch Bank, 37 D. 725.

Eviction or failure of title does not at law constitute a defense to an action for the purchase price of lands, although the conveyance thereof contained covenants of general warranty. Ib.

A vendee in possession cannot defend against an action for the payment of the purchase-money of land. Giles v. Williams, 37 D. 692.

A vendee in possession may resist the action for purchase-money without surrendering possession, if the vendor is unable to make title according to his agreement, and the vendor, in such a case, must rescind the agreement and sue for the possession. Gane v. Renshaw, 44 D. 152.

The vendee does not waive objections to vendor's title by taking possession under an agreement to convey if he was ignorant of the defect at the time. Ib.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

Vendor's title must be beyond doubt, or he cannot compel the purchaser to take the land and pay the purchase-money. Ib.

The vendor cannot recover the purchase price of land contracted for, if it appears that he has no title. Miles v. Stevens, 45 D. 621.

The vendee cannot resist payment of purchase-money, on ground of defect of title, while he retains the warranty bond and continues in the possession of the land. Lynch v. Baxter, 51 D. 735.

In an action on a note given for the purchase of land, the possession of a warranty bond for title and possession of the land afford ample and legal consideration to entitle the plaintiff to recover, without regard to title. Ib.

In an action for the purchase price of land, where the defendant set up as a defense that the land conveyed was not the land which he intended and agreed to purchase, a charge to the jury, that if the defendant was negotiating for one thing, and the plaintiff was selling another, and their minds did not agree as to the subject-matter of the sale, there would be no contract by which the defendant would be bound, though there was no fraud on the part of the plaintiff, is correct. Kyle v. Kavanagh, 4 R. 560.

C. bought certain real estate, upon which there was a mortgage, took a deed containing a covenant of warranty and the usual full covenants, and gave his bond for the payment of a portion of the purchase-money. A foreclosure of the original mortgage was permitted by the grantor, and C. bid off the property at the sheriff's sale, but immediately assigned his bid to H., to whom the deed was executed. In an action on the bond, — held, that there had been an eviction of C., and that he was not liable. Cowdry v. Colt, 4 R. 690.

2. Failure of consideration or title, when a defense. — Failure of consideration is a good plea to an action on a promissory note, as where the plea shows that the note was given in consideration of a bond to convey lands in fee-simple, within a specified time, and that the lands were not so conveyed, and that the obligor in the bond had not title to the lands. Tyler v. Young, 35 D. 116.

Where on a public sale of town lots, it is in proof that a certain lot extending to the Tombigbee River was on the day of sale reserved as a depot for a railroad, which was to have its terminus at that point, and the lot bought by the defendant, and other lots similarly situated, were regarded at the sale as front business lots, and consequently brought higher prices, and afterwards the railroad was abandoned and the lot intended for the depot was sold out in small lots, covered, at the time of the trial, with cotton-sheds, cutting off from the river the lot purchased, and making it a back instead of a front lot, causing it to greatly depreciate in value, these facts would justify and require a court of equity to rescind the contract, and will form a good defense to an action on a writing obligatory given for the price. Anderson v. Hill, 51 D. 130.

Where the vendee received a bond for title, to be made when the purchase-money was paid, and that was payable in installments, the right to enforce payment is not distinct and independent from the ability to make title, and the defendant may set up and show in bar of the action on the notes a want of title in the vendor. Feemster v. May, 53 D. 83.

A defect of title to the land is a good defense to the vendee in an action for the purchase-money, so long as the contract is executory; and the vendor must show that the vendee purchased at his own risk, and with knowledge of the defect, or that he agreed to take such title as the vendor had. Cooper v. Singleton, 70 D. 333.

A vendee in an executed contract for realty cannot resist payment of the purchase-money for defect or failure of title, as a general rule, both in England and in the United States; but unless there have been fraudulent representations, must pay the money, and rely upon the covenants in his deed; but the rule is otherwise in Texas, and the vendee, after conveyance, may resist payment for a total failure of title, though there be no fraud, and is not compelled to resort to his covenants, especially where the vendor is or may be insolvent or beyond the reach of the court, unless the vendee takes a conveyance with warranty, with knowledge of the defects, when he cannot resist payment unless he has been evicted. Ib.

The distinction between the liabilities of a vendee in an executory and a vendee in an executed contract for the sale of realty is, that the former should be relieved from payment on showing defect of title, unless the vendor shows that he knew the defect at the sale, and consented to take such title as the vendor had; while the vendee in an executed contract, to escape payment, should show, beyond doubt, failure of title in whole or in part, danger of eviction, and circumstances prima facie repelling the presumption that he knew, and took the risk of the defect at the time of the sale. Ib.

It is a good defense to an action by the vendor for the price of land, brought after the last installment of the price is due, that he agreed to convey the patent title of the land to the vendee, and that he never had such title, and is unable to convey it. Runkle v. Johnson, 83 D. 191.

The vendee may defend the action for the price by showing that title is defective, when the subject of the contract of sale is the land itself, because he has a right to a title to the land clear of defects and encum-branches, in the absence of any stipulation to the contrary. Herrod v. Blackburn, 94 D. 49.

3. When not a defense. — In an action on a promissory note for the purchase-money of land conveyed with covenants of seisin and warranty, failure of title or want of title in the grantor is no defense. Lloyd v. Jewell, 10 D. 73.

And where the deed contained a condition that upon breach of any covenant therein, the damages might be paid in cash to the amount received in money, and the residue by surrendering such notes given for the purchase-money as remained unpaid, in an action on one of the notes, some of them having been paid, — held, that the defendant could not show a breach of the covenant of seisin for part of the land, to the value of the note. Ib.

A purchaser holding undisturbed and undisputed possession of property under a sale cannot, in an action on a promissory note given for the price, set up as a defense that the title to the property was not in the seller at the time of the sale. In such a case there is not properly a failure of consideration so as to allow the consideration to be impeached, under a statute, regulating the proceedings in justices' courts, which allows the maker of a promissory note to impeach its consideration and show a total or partial failure of the consideration. Morrison v. Edgar, 57 D. 238.

The vendor having conveyed the equitable interest existing under a title bond, and authorized the vendee to acquire the legal title, the vendee's default in failing to obtain the legal title furnishes him no defense against the payment of the purchase-money. Bailey v. James, 62 D. 659.

The defense of failure of title to the payment of the price of land is extinguished if the party attempting to set up an adverse title is, by his acts toward the vendee at such sale, estopped from setting up such title. Beaupland v. McKeen, 70 D. 115.

Actual eviction is necessary to constitute a defense on the ground of failure of consideration from a defect in title, where a deed has been given, and the purchaser has entered into possession; although an eviction is not necessary where there has been no conveyance. The grantee, who is not evicted, but remains in undisturbed possession, must rely on his covenants, except in case of fraud. Timms v. Shannon, 81 D. 632.

The defense of want of title may be met by a showing on the part of the vendor that he still owns the title in equity, and can control it for the benefit of the purchaser. Bunkie v. Johnson, 83 D. 191.

Where a vendor who has sold land on installments brings action for the first installments before the last one becomes due, want of title may be no defense, for he may claim the whole time until the contract matures to acquire title. Ib.

Want of title cannot be set up against payment of purchase-money by a vendee who has protected himself by covenants of warranty, unless he shows a previous eviction, or in cases where there has been fraud; and this rule applies to personal as well as real property. Ware v. Houghton, 93 D. 258.

4. Non-performance by vendor. — An action for the purchase price of a town lot cannot be successfully resisted upon the ground of the failure of the vendor to comply with his promise made, as owner of the town in which the lot was situated, at the time of the public sale at which it was bid off, to erect a storehouse in the town, and to build a bridge across a river that passed through the town. Miller v. Howell, 32 D. 86.

The purchaser of lands with covenants for title cannot, in an action on a note given for the purchase-money, prove a breach of the covenants, there being no suggestion of fraud, of eviction, or of insolvency. Guice v. Sellers, 5 R. 476.

Where covenants are mutual and concomitant, neither party can enforce the contract against the other without showing performance, or tender of performance, on his own part. Accordingly, where an agreement was entered into between the plaintiff and defendant for the sale of a tract of land to the latter, one third of the purchase-money to be paid on a certain day, when a title was to be given free from all encumbrances, and the remaining purchase-money to be paid by installments, and the defendant entered into possession, but not having paid the first installment on the day named, no conveyance was tendered, but subsequently a deed was tendered, which the defendant refused to accept, part of the first installment never having been paid, — held, in an action by the plaintiff to recover the purchase-money, that the defendant could not give evidence of damages sustained through the plaintiff's unwillingness or inability to make title on the day. Cassell v. Cooke, 11 D. 610.

5. Fraud. — The vendee of a tract of land cannot resist the payment of the purchase price on the ground of fraud and failure of consideration, when it appears that he entered upon and continued in the quiet possession of the land after he discovered the falsity of the representations that it was free from encumbrances. Christian v. Scott, 18 D. 68.

Fraud is not, at law, a defense to an action to recover the purchase price of lands, if the purchaser has accepted a conveyance, and retains possession of the land. Cullum v. Branch Bank, 37 D. 725; and the property is not shown to be absolutely worthless, and has not been returned or reconveyed on discovering the fraud. Van Epps v. Harrison, 40 D. 314.

Evidence raising a suspicion that the vendor holds under a fraudulent conveyance to him as creditor, by a failing debtor, though not amounting to clear proof of fraud, should be left to the jury in an action by such vendor against a purchaser from him to recover the purchase-money for the premises, where the latter defends on the ground of a defect in the title. Gans v. Renshaw, 44 D. 152.

The defense of fraud in a contract of sale may, apart from and independent of any defect of title, be made in an action for the price of the land, although the defendant has not been evicted or disturbed in the possession of his lot. Anderson v. Hill, 51 D. 130.

6. Encumbrances, dower right, etc. — Encumbrances known to vendor and vendee at the time of the sale, and provided against by a covenant of warranty in the deed, constitute no ground of defense to an action for the purchase price. Fuhrman v. Loudon, 15 D. 608.

An agreement in writing that the vendee might pay off the notes given for the purchase price by discharging an encumbrance on the realty is binding, and not revocable at pleasure. Joy v. Hull, 24 D. 625.

A right of dower in the grantor's wife to a part of the land conveyed by a warranty deed cannot be set up, in an action upon a note given for the purchase price, to show a failure of the consideration. Whisler v. Hicks, 33 D. 454.

7. Outstanding title. — A vendee in possession cannot set up an outstanding title in a third person as a defense to an action brought to recover the purchase price of the land. Larkin v. Bank of Montgomery, 33 D. 324.

A purchaser of land from one who acquired it by parol gift from her father, and who gave to her vendee her father's conveyance of the same, is estopped, in an action by the vendor for the price, from setting up as a defense that the gift to the daughter was void because not in writing, or from setting up a title adverse to that conveyed by the deed. Russell v. Watt, 93 D. 270.

57. Offsets in action for price. — A deficiency of quantity so great as to defeat the object of the purchase is a good cause for rescinding a contract for the sale of lands; or it may be set off as an offset against the bonds given for the consideration money. Pringle v. Witten, 1 D. 612.

A set-off of any encumbrances discharged may be made by the vendee, but he is still liable for the balance. Tod v. Gallagher, 16 D. 571.

A purchaser of land under a deed containing covenants against encumbrances, if he subsequently pays off and discharges any encumbrance, may set off what has been paid by him against the amount due on a mortgage for the purchase price, if what was paid was actually due, or he had given notice to his vendor requiring him to pay off the encumbrance. Grant v. Tallman, 75 D. 384.

Vendees may set off, to the extent of the unpaid purchase-money, the value of growing timber taken from the land by the holder of an adverse title while in possession under an order of restitution, although the vendees were not entitled to a conveyance until the purchase-money was paid, and had taken no covenant for prior possession, where the vendor sold the land pending an action of ejectment, and, on recovery, put his vendees in possession, from which they were evicted on reversal of the judgment, and upon a retrial, judgment was again rendered against him, which he suffered to remain final, but on succeeding in another ejectment, he restored his vendees to possession. Weakland v. Hoffman, 88 D. 560.

Where a person who has purchased land, but has not yet procured a conveyance, desires to sell it to another, and when he proceeds to do so, suggests that, to save writing, the purchaser take a deed directly from the person holding the legal title, which suggestion is adopted, and it afterwards transpires that there was a mortgage on the land, which the purchaser had to pay, he can recoup this amount upon a note which he has given to the person from whom he has purchased, and who induced him to take the conveyance from the third person. Brown v. Crowley, 99 D. 462.

58. Pleading. — A declaration in assumpsit by a vendor, on a contract for the sale of real property, ought to state a positive assumption by the defendant, and to aver that the plaintiff was seised of a good estate in fee-simple. Hampton v. Speckengale, 11 D. 704.

In assumpsit for the price of land sold, the complaint need not allege that the contract was in writing. Kibby v. Chitwood, 16 D. 143.

The plea of a vendee in an executed contract must aver want of knowledge of a defect in title to the land purchased, where he seeks to defeat a recovery of the purchase-money on the ground of such defect. Cooper v. Singleton, 70 D. 333.

The defense of defect or failure of title is of equitable nature in an action to recover the price of land sold, and a plea setting up such defense should aver facts which would warrant relief in equity. Ib.

A plea by the husband's vendee that the title is defective because the property was community property, and that the vendor's wife is dead, leaving several children, should show the condition of the community estate, so as to negative any idea that the heirs may be satisfied out of other property, in an action for the purchase-money. Ib.

In an action for the purchase-money under an agreement for the sale of land, by which the plaintiff bound himself to give possession and execute a warranty deed upon the payment of the purchase-money, the declaration alleged that plaintiff had at all times been ready and willing to perform his part of the agreement; but the defendant pleaded that the plaintiff was not seised of the land agreed to be conveyed. Held, that under the issue thus raised, plaintiff was called upon to prove his title. Negley v. Lindsay, 5 R. 427.

59. Evidence. — The vendor suing for purchase-money must show that he has performed or offered to perform his part of the contract. Tyler v. Young, 35 D. 116.

The vendor may rely upon his tender of a deed without producing the evidence of his title, the burden being on the purchaser to show such a defect in the title as justifies him in refusing to accept the deed. Dwight v. Cutler, 64 D. 105.

Parol evidence cannot be given by a witness to show that he was seised of any part of the land conveyed, in order to rebut the claim and title of the vendor to any portion of the land included in the deed, or to show that the title to any part of the land so conveyed was not in the vendor at the time of the conveyance. Sharpe v. Gibson, 2 D. 529.

An action for the breach of a written agreement to purchase land, brought before the expiration of the time given for the purchase, cannot be maintained by proof of an absolute refusal on the defendant's part ever to purchase. Daniels v. Newton, 19 R. 384.

In an action upon promissory notes given in part payment for a distillery and fixtures, the defense set up was that by reason of certain violations of the revenue laws, by the payee of the notes and vendor of the property, prior to the purchase by the defendant, a portion of the property was, after such purchase, seized, condemned, and sold by the officers of the United States, whereby the defendant's title failed and the property was lost. On the trial the defendant put in evidence the record of the seizure and condemnation. It did not disclose by whom or at what time the penalty which worked a forfeiture and loss of the property was incurred. An offer of the defendant, to prove by extrinsic evidence that the illegal acts established by the decree were done by those operating the distillery before the purchase by him, was excluded by the court. Held, that such exclusion was error. McKnight v. Devlin, 11 R. 715.

60. Resale on non-payment of price. — The vendor, under a contract for the sale of land, after he has been notified by the vendee of his refusal to complete the purchase, may resell the land, and hold the vendee liable for the stipulated penalty. Baney v. Killmer, 44 D. 109.

The election, once made, is irrevocable. Id.

61. Action to recover the land on purchaser's failure to perform. — 1. The right of action. — A vendor under a contract for the sale of lands may maintain ejectment therefor against his vendee, who has entered into possession by the consent of the vendor, but who has made default in the payments stipulated for in the contract, and which were conditions precedent to the execution of a conveyance to the vendee. Browning v. Estes, 49 D. 760; Seabury v. Stewart, 58 D. 254. Hicks v. Lovell, 49 R. 679.

The possession of a vendee under a contract for the sale of land, entered into by permission of the vendor, becomes tortious when the vendee disaffirms the contract, disavows the title under which he has entered, or refuses payment of the purchase-money. Browning v. Estes, 49 D. 760.

The vendor has an election to treat the vendee as a tenant or a trespasser, where the latter has been let into possession and fails to comply with his contract. Seabury v. Stewart, 58 D. 254.

The vendor conveying to a stranger after default of the vendee in possession in not paying according to contract does not release the latter or render his possession adverse to the vendor's grantee, and the latter stands in the vendor's shoes; so where the vendor's executors, having power to sell, convey to a stranger after the vendee's default. Id.

A vendee refusing to go on with his contract after paying part of the purchase-money forfeits the amount already paid, and the vendor may bring ejectment and recover the land agreed to be conveyed. Estes v. Browning, 60 D. 238.

Where one is in possession of real estate under bond for title, and has given a note for the purchase price, which he fails to pay, the obligor may either sue on the note and subject the land and other property to its payment, or he could eject the possessor from the land, unless the latter should bring the money into court and claim a specific performance of the agreement, he not having waived it otherwise than by failure in point of time of payment. Walker v. Emerson, 73 D. 207.

2. Notice to quit given on the same day that ejectment is brought by a vendor to a vendee in possession under an executory contract of sale, or to one holding under the vendee, is insufficient; in such a case, reasonable notice, to be determined by the circumstances of each case, must be given. Fears v. Merrill, 50 D. 226.

One entering into possession of land with the owner's consent is as much entitled to notice as a tenant under a lease, or one who enters under an executory contract; if his entry is peaceable and lawful, he is never to be regarded as a trespasser, unless he holds over after notice, or does some tortious act. Id.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

Notice must be given by the vendor to the vendee in possession under an executory contract for the sale of land, to enable the vendor to avoid the contract and reclaim his possession, unless the vendee, by his own wrongful act, has placed himself in the attitude of a wrong-doer, as by denying the title of him who holds the fee, or claiming under adverse title; but a mere neglect to pay the purchase-money when due is not sufficient for that purpose. Id.

A vendor executing a bond for title to his vendee upon the payment of the purchase-money at a future day, and putting him into possession, may, if the money is not paid when due, by first giving to the vendee reasonable notice to quit, avoid his contract and maintain an action of ejectment for the land; or if the vendee has by his own act placed himself, in legal contemplation, in the attitude of a trespasser, the vendor may treat him as such, and sue without giving notice. Id.

When possession is obtained by vendee, under an agreement to convey, notice to quit, when he fails to comply with the requirements of the contract, is unnecessary. Glascock v. Roberts, 55 D. 108. Seabury v. Stewart, 58 D. 254.

3. Matters of defense. — The vendee cannot avail himself of an outstanding title disclosed by the vendor in his evidence, or by a grantee of the vendor, so as to prevent a recovery in ejectment, where he is in possession under a contract of purchase, and is in default as to payment. Seabury v. Stewart, 58 D. 254.

The equitable title arising out of the contract for sale of land is a defense, where law and equity are blended, to an action instituted to recover the possession of the land. Tibbels v. Tibbels, 59 D. 329.

A contract for sale of land under which the purchase-money has been paid and possession delivered is a good defense to an action by the grantor to recover the possession of the land or of the title deeds delivered. Id.

A condition of a contract for purchase of land, that a party let into possession may purchase on payment of a certain sum of money, time not being of the essence of the contract, would entitle the party to make such payment within a reasonable time after the commencement of an action in ejectment. Taylor v. Baldwin, 73 D. 736.

4. Measure of damages in ejectment by the vendor against a vendee in possession under an executory contract for the sale of land is the value of the land from the date of the demand and refusal, as the cause of action does not arise till that time. Fears v. Merrill, 50 D. 226.

63. Suit in equity to enforce vendor's lien. — A decree for the sale of land to pay a balance due under a title bond is not against the vendee personally, but against the land, and the personal liability of the vendee is not in question; consequently a defendant cannot object to such a decree on the ground that the contract for the sale of the land was entered into by his co-defendant in their joint names, without his knowledge or consent, and without any subsequent ratification by him. Mosby v. Wall, 55 D. 71.

63. — or for specific performance. — The vendor as well as the vendee may invoke the power of a court of equity to enforce the specific performance of a contract for the sale of land. Old Colony R. R. Corp. v. Evans, 66 D. 394.

The vendor's right to specific performance is not defeated on the ground that he has an adequate remedy at law, since the measure of damages at law is not the contract price, but only the difference between this and the market value of the land at the time of the breach of the contract. Id.

Where the vendee waives his right to abandon the contract, he will be compelled to perform it. Pugh v. Chesseldine, 37 D. 414.

The vendor may maintain a bill for specific performance, where the vendee refuses to accept a conveyance or to pay the purchase-money, notwithstanding the remedy at law for the money; but a final decree for the money, in such a case, with an award of execution, is wrong; the decree should direct a sale of the premises in case of default in payment, and should require the complainant to deposit with the master a proper conveyance to be delivered upon payment of the money. Andrews v. Sullivan, 43 D. 53.

Delay of the vendor in not tendering the deed until after the day, where he has covenanted to convey land on or before a certain day, "on payment" of a part of the purchase-money, does not prevent his maintaining a bill for specific performance, where the money was not paid or tendered on the day or afterwards, and the vendor's delay was owing to an unexpected absence from home on the day, and he has used due diligence in trying to perform his contract after his return. Id.

The vendor of land, who has given bond to make title to the vendee on payment of the purchase-money, cannot maintain a bill for the specific performance of the contract until he has put the vendee in default by the tender of a deed. The covenants, to make title, and to pay the money, are concurrent, mutual, and dependent; and neither party can insist on a performance of the contract without an offer or tender of performance on his part; and this rule applies with equal force in law and equity. Robinson v. Harbour, 97 D. 501.

2. Of the Purchaser.

64. Action for possession. — A vendor representing that an entire tract can be acquired under a warrant which he holds for a certain number of acres, when part of the tract only can be legally acquired thereunder, and thereby inducing the vendee to enter into articles for the purchase of the land acquired by said warrant, and subsequently procuring a warrant for the residue of the tract, will be treated in equity as a trustee ex maleficio, and in ejectment in the nature of a bill for specific performance, the vendee, upon proof of such representations, can recover the entire tract. Tyson v. Passmore, 44 D. 181.

A vendee never in possession is not liable for interest on unpaid purchase-money in ejectment brought by him to enforce the contract. Ib.

The grantor has a superior right to land until the purchase-money is paid, or the mortgage given therefor is foreclosed, where, simultaneously with the conveyance, such mortgage is executed; and especially if the grantor is in possession after the vendee has made default, he cannot be turned out of possession by process of ejectment or trespass to try title, although the debt and mortgage are barred by the statute of limitations. Dunlap v. Wright, 62 D. 506.

A district court of the United States has jurisdiction to render judgment of eviction against a remote vendor with notice of suit, and in favor of a remote vendee with special warranty. The vendor is concluded by judgment in such case. Hunt v. Orwig, 66 D. 144.

The vendor cannot, in an action between himself and a remote vendee, impeach the consideration expressed in his deed to his immediate vendee in order to lessen the amount of recovery; nor can he in such action avail himself of fraud practiced upon him by his vendee. Ib.

A grantor with covenants of warranty is not entitled to notice to quit, or demand of possession, before the commencement of an action of ejectment against him by the grantee, or those claiming under the latter. Dodge v. Walley, 83 D. 61.

65. — or specific performance. — If the vendor acts mala fide, and refuses to convey because the land has increased in value, the vendee may compel a specific performance, or recover as damages the difference between the contract price and the enhanced value. Baldwin v. Munn, 20 D. 627.

An action at law by the vendee in a contract for the purchase of real estate to recover back an installment of the purchase price paid, upon the vendor's failing to convey as agreed, amounts to a rescission of the contract, and it cannot afterwards be specifically enforced at the instance of the vendee. Herrington v. Hubbard, 33 D. 426.

Such action is a disaffirmance of the contract, and is, in legal contemplation, notice to every person of such fact; so that thereafter the vendor is at liberty to treat the contract as rescinded, and to sell and convey the land to a third person. Ib.

Where the vendee gives his notes to the vendor, who agrees to convey the land to him upon payment of the notes, the vendor will not be decreed to convey the land until an account is taken of the amount of principal and interest due on the notes, and a day is fixed for the payment of such amount into court for the party entitled. Johnson v. Jackson, 61 D. 522.

A vendee may enforce performance, in a district court, of a contract to convey community land in Texas, as against the vendor's widow and heirs, although the vendor has since died, and the succession and administration of his estate is still open in the county court, and the vendee has been appointed administrator. The vendee's claim is not a money demand which must be presented to and allowed by an administrator, or which the vendee, being himself administrator, must file. Robinson v. McDonald, 62 D. 480.

A vendee is entitled to specific performance, with abatement in price, where a vendor of land misdescribes it as to quality in the agreement. Harbers v. Gadsden, 62 D. 390.

A vendee seeking to enforce specific performance need not tender a deed to the vendor for execution before bringing suit. Young v. Daniels, 63 D. 477.

Where, under a contract to convey, the vendee requires a marketable title, and the wife of the vendor refuses to join in the conveyance, equity will not compel the vendor to procure a conveyance or release by his wife, or require him to furnish indemnity against her right of dower, unless in cases of clear fraud. Haworthy v. Warren, 90 D. 613.

A vendor who contracts to convey an estate which he has not at the time will be compelled to specifically perform his contract if he afterwards becomes the owner. Filley v. Duncan, 93 D. 337.

In a suit by a subpurchaser for specific performance, the intermediate vendors through whom he has acquired his equity are generally necessary parties. Henderson v. Pickett, 16 D. 130.

A decree in a suit by a subpurchaser against the intermediate vendors and the holder of a legal title, for a specific performance of a contract of sale, is conclusive on all the parties; and hence, to entitle him to such decree, he must establish a valid equity against each. Ib.

Where one party to a contract, in consideration of the other party's undertaking to pay him for a tract of land, covenants to convey the land to such party, without naming any time for performance, the payment of the money, not the promise to pay it, is the real consideration for the promise to convey; and in an action on such covenant the plaintiff must aver either that he paid the money, or that he has tendered, and is ready and willing to pay it. McCoy v. Bizbee, 27 D. 258.

A bill for specific performance may be amended to ask rescission, together with other relief, in a suit on a contract to exchange lands, where it appears on the trial that the defendant cannot make title. Parvill v. McKinley, 58 D. 212.

If a person agree to convey 500 acres out of one of two tracts of land, it is erroneous to decree a conveyance of 250 acres out of each tract. McConnell v. Dunlap, 3 D. 723.

An agreement was made for the sale of land during the existence of paper money, part payment to be made in June, 1780, when a conveyance was to be made, and the remainder in twelve months thereafter. The money was not paid or tendered at the day, nor was a conveyance made. A bill being brought by the vendee for a specific performance, he was, under the circumstances of the case, decreed a conveyance upon his paying the value of the land at the time of the contract, instead of the value of the purchase-money agreed upon, according to the scale of depreciation. White v. Atkinson, 1 D. 470.

The plaintiff under an oral agreement for the sale of land took possession, paid in full, and made valuable improvements. One of the defendants, with knowledge of her rights, forcibly took possession of the land, dug a cellar, moved a house thereon, and made additions to it. The house could have been removed without material injury to the land. The plaintiff's vendor deeded the land to that defendant, and the latter afterward deeded to other defendants who had full knowledge of the facts. Held, that specific performance being decreed, the court would not authorize the removal of the house, although the defendants acted in the belief that the plaintiff's claim was invalid. Honsik v. Delaglie, 56 R. 634.

66. What title purchaser will be compelled to accept. — A bond to "make an indefeasible title in fee-simple, such as the state makes," demands a deed with general warranty; and under such obligation the court will not compel the vendee to accept a title that is doubtful. Kelly v. Bradford, 6 D. 656.

If a purchaser can get the substantial inducement to his contract, he may insist upon taking and be made to accept a title to so much as can be given, compensation being made for the deficiency. Evans v. Kingsberry, 14 D. 779.

A purchaser contracting for a good title cannot be compelled to accept a mere equitable title, or a good legal title which is subject to litigation in chancery in consequence of some valid equitable claim. Morris v. Mowatt, 22 D. 661.

The vendor in a contract for the sale of a tract of land, or his legal representatives as such, can alone make such title as the vendee will be compelled to accept, and the administrator of such vendor who holds in his own right the title to the land agreed to be conveyed, cannot compel the vendee to accept the title under his contract with the deceased. Taylor v. Porter, 25 D. 155.

A vendee who has, without success, made every reasonable effort to obtain the title contracted to be conveyed to him, and who has abandoned the possession and filed his bill for a rescission, cannot then be compelled to accept the title. Ib.

A covenant to sell and convey requires the giving a good title to the covenantee, free from all encumbrances. Sibley v. Spring, 28 D. 191.

On a breach of such covenant, the covenantee may recover the value of certain services, part consideration for the covenant, with interest. Ib.

A conveyance of land subject to a quitrent under a covenant to convey "clear of all encumbrances," does not satisfy it, and the vendee cannot be compelled to take the land with compensation for the encumbrance, and the vendee's knowledge of the existence of the quitrent shortly after the bargain, and making a payment thereon, do not alter the case. Gans v. Renshaw, 44 D. 152.

Equity will compel a vendee to take a good title subject to a pecuniary charge, where adequate security is given, although it will not compel him to take a defective title. Thompson v. Carpenter, 45 D. 681.

A vendee of land under an executory contract does not waive an objection to the title merely by going into and remaining in possession. There must be other facts, such as show that he had a knowledge of its defects, and intended to accept such title as could be made, and to rely, in case of its failure, upon the covenants of warranty for redress. Jones v. Taylor, 56 D. 48.

A party contracting to purchase an entire estate will not be compelled to take part of it in case a defect appear in the title to the balance, even if proportionate compensation can be awarded for the part in respect to which the title is defective. Gibert v. Peteler, 97 D. 785.

67. Action for breach of contract in failing or refusing to convey. — 1. The right of action. — On a contract for a tract of land, if the vendor be able to convey but a part only, the vendee may at his election compel a conveyance of that part, and recover damages for the deficiency, or he may refuse to take such part, and recover damages for the whole. McConnell v. Dunlap, 3 D. 723.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume E.

The vendee's remedy on a breach of a contract to convey, on payment of the purchase-money, where payment has been duly made, is by action on the contract, and he cannot rescind the contract and sue for the purchase-money and interest. Fuller v. Hubbard, 16 D. 423.

The vendee must demand a conveyance in such a case, after paying or tendering the purchase-money, and must attend to receive it, after waiting a reasonable time for it to be made out. Ib.

Refusal of the vendor to make title on demand warrants the vendee in bringing an action on the contract for the breach thereof, although such action does not necessarily suppose the contract to be at an end. Duncan v. Jeter, 39 D. 342.

A vendee need not surrender possession or demand a deed before suit for breach of a contract to convey land on a day named, where no precedent act is to be performed by the vendee, nor even though such precedent act is required if the vendor has no title. Shaw v. Wilkins, 49 D. 692.

2. Rules of pleading. — Where a vendor who agrees to convey, upon the payment of money and the execution of notes at a certain time, before that time conveys to another, the vendee in an action for the breach must aver readiness to perform, although a tender of performance is not necessary. Stow v. Stevens, 29 D. 139.

In such a case, if part of the money has been paid, the vendee may regard the contract as rescinded, and sue in assumpsit for the sum advanced. Ib.

Damages for breach of an unexecuted parol contract to convey land cannot be recovered under a declaration for goods sold and delivered or money had and received. Gauger v. Fry, 55 D. 578.

Evidence tending to establish a claim for damages for breach of a parol contract to convey land is irrelevant when offered under a declaration for goods sold and delivered or money had and received. Ib.

Plaintiff suing for breach of a parol contract for purchase of a moiety of land subsequently sold to another by the vendor may waive the tort, and recover a moiety of the money received at the second sale, under a count for money had and received, if the contract has been so far executed as to take the case out of the statute of frauds, and to vest in the plaintiff an interest or estate in the land, so as to entitle him to a conveyance. Ib.

3. Evidence. — The value of the premises in an action to recover damages for breach of contract to convey land may be proved by plaintiff, not only by showing the worth of other property of equal value adjacent to that in controversy, at or near the date of the instrument, but even the value of lands of a different quality, lying in the immediate vicinity, leaving it for the jury to determine the difference in value. White v. Hermann, 99 D. 543.

Evidence of value of land shortly after it should have been conveyed is admissible to show what its value was at that time in an action for breach of contract to convey. Abell v. Munson, 100 D. 165.

On a contract to convey "about sixty-five acres," the vendee is not bound to accept thirty or thirty-six acres. And in an action by the vendee for breach of such a contract, parol evidence is inadmissible to prove a sale of sixty-five acres, or the vendor's representation that there were at least sixty-five acres. Baltimore Permanent etc. Soc. v. Smith, 39 R. 374.

4. *Measure of damages. — A vendor commits a fraud in selling a specified tract of land, knowing he has no title. In this case the damages should be the value of the land estimated at the time of the trial, it not appearing when the contract was to be performed. McConnell v. Dunlap, 3 D. 723.

A vendor who contracts to sell and convey land must respond to the vendee in damages, to the extent of the difference between the contract price and the value of the land at the time of the breach, where he has the title, and for any reason refuses to convey it, as required by the contract. Pumpelly v. Phelps, 100 D. 463. S. P., Shaw v. Wilkins, 49 D. 692; Hall v. Delaplaine, 68 D. 57; Warner v. Bacon, 69 D. 253.

A vendor who contracts to sell and convey land is liable to the vendee in nominal damages only, for breach of contract, where he contracts in good faith, believing he has a good title, and afterwards, on discovering his title to be defective, for that reason refuses or is unable to fulfill his contract; but this rule should not in any degree be extended, but strictly limited to those cases coming exactly within it. Pumpelly v. Phelps, 100 D. 463.

A vendor who contracts to sell and convey land must make good to the vendee his loss of bargain, where he knows at the time that he has not the title or the power of conveyance, although he may have acted in good faith, and believed that he should be able to procure a good title for the vendee. Ib.

The measure of damages for failure of vendor to convey realty, by deed with covenants of general warranty, according to agreement, he being disabled to comply with the contract by reason of failure of his title without his own fault, is the amount of the purchase-money and interest. Hall v. Delaplaine, 68 D. 57. S. P., Herndon v. Harrison, 69 D. 399; and the expenses of the plaintiff for travel, board, and counsel fees while attending to the execution and fulfillment of the contract. Baltimore Permanent etc. Soc. v. Smith, 39 R. 374.

A vendee suing for damages for breach of contract to convey land can recover nothing, where the vendor, before suit, offered to return the notes given for the purchase price, and brings them into court and tenders them to the plaintiff. Herndon v. Harrison, 69 D. 399.

A vendee is not entitled to interest on damages for breach of a contract to convey land from the time of the breach, as matter of law, though the jury may, perhaps, allow interest, in their discretion, by way of enhancing the damages under proper circumstances. Shaw v. Wilkins, 49 D. 692.

5. Compensation for improvements.—If land be sold by a verbal sale, and possession given to the purchaser, he will be allowed in equity for improvements made by him, if the vendor refuses to convey the property. McC Campbell v. McC Campbell, 15 D. 48.

Where a vendee in possession under a parol agreement for the purchase of lands makes improvements upon the premises, he cannot recover the value of such improvements in an action at law upon the refusal of the vendor to fulfill the contract. Smith v. Smith, 78 D. 49.

68. Action for damages for defects in title, eviction, etc.—1. Right of action.—A vendee cannot set up defects or want of title in vendor in defense of action for purchase-money, nor rescind the contract and recover back what he has paid, but must rely upon his covenants, where there is no fraud, and he has obtained any benefit by the conveyance, or acquired any estate or interest whatever in the premises. The covenants are for his protection in case his title is defeated by some outstanding title. Brown v. Manning, 74 D. 736.

Where a contract is sought to be avoided on the ground of fraud or failure of consideration, if any value appears to attach to defendant's title, a condition to reconvey in the verdict will do equity; and if after verdict it should appear that a reconveyance ought to be made, the court may restrain execution until it is made. Babcock v. Case, 100 D. 654.

Where a contract is made for the sale of land, the vendor to give a warranty deed on payment of the purchase-money, and between the time of the contract and the making of the deed a portion of the land is condemned for a railroad, damages for the taking of the land belong in equity to the purchaser, and he cannot treat such taking as an encumbrance and recover therefor on the covenants in the deed. Stevenson v. Lochr, 11 R. 36.

A owned land under a deed on its face subject to a lien for unpaid purchase-money. He conveyed to B an undivided fourth interest thereof, with warranty, B assuming in consideration thereof to pay one fourth of the lien debt. By agreement between A and his grantors, the amount of the lien debt was reduced to a sum less than that due from B, no part of which had been paid, and the land was sold to satisfy the lien. Held, that B was not entitled to any recovery on the warranty; that he was entitled to share in the reduction of the lien debt, and liable to A for one fourth thereof as reduced. Snyder v. Summers, 27 R. 778.

2. The damages recoverable.—The measure of damages, where a vendee of land is evicted, is the purchase-money, with interest during the time while the vendee was liable for mesne profits. Fernander v. Dunn, 65 D. 607.

An evicted vendee who has enjoyed the land for a period before paramount title accrued, during which he was not liable for mesne profits, cannot recover against his vendor interest on the purchase-money during this period. Ib.

Where there is an entire failure of title to real estate conveyed with covenants of warranty, the measure of damages for breach of covenants, in absence of fraud, is the purchase-money and interest. Phillips v. Reichert, 79 D. 463.

Where eviction is partial, damages will bear same proportion to the whole purchase-money that the value of the part to which the title fails bears to the whole premises, estimated at the price paid. Ib.

Covenants bind the covenantor that he is seised of land, and that he will warrant and defend title, or in default thereof that he will return the purchase-money and interest; or if the title fail in part, that he will return a ratable proportion of the purchase-money and interest. Ib.

The fact that land was bought for a particular purpose, which was known to the vendor, can make no difference in respect to the rule of damages for a breach of the covenants. Ib.

Where title to land fails in whole or in part, and fraud can be shown, or concealment, which would be evidence of it, it will constitute a good ground of action, in which the purchaser can recover all his damages. Ib.

The basis of damages for partial failure of title is the relative general value of the part to which the title fails compared with the whole, without limitation of the purposes to which it may be applied, or for which it may have value. Ib.

Where a title to a part only of the land fails, the sale cannot be rescinded, and the whole consideration recovered back, but damages will be recovered in proportion to the extent of the defect of title, or the value of the part lost, in proportion to the price of the whole. Morris v. Phelps, 4 D. 323.

The measure of damages for failure or defect of title to part of the land conveyed is the relative value which the part taken away bears to the whole, as fixed by the price agreed upon for the whole, subject, however, to proof by the parties that the part lost was of greater or less value from particular advantages or disadvantages. But the expense of improvements cannot be considered in estimating such damages. Beaupland v. McKeen, 70 D. 115.

69. Action for compensation for deficiency in quantity of land conveyed.

— When misrepresentation is made as to quantity, though innocently, the purchaser has a right to have what the vendor can give, with an abatement out of the purchase-money for so much as the quantity falls short of the representation; and compensation or abatement on account of the deficiency ought to be in proportion to the price given for the whole tract as represented, without regard to foreign estimates of the value of the land. Harrell v. Hill, 68 D. 202; Cabot v. Christie, 1 R. 313. This rule prevails, although the land was described in the deed as so many acres, "more or less." Smith v. Fly, 76 D. 109.

A deficiency of sixty-seven acres in a tract expressed in the deed to contain six hundred and ten acres, more or less, is not such a deficiency as will entitle the grantee to a rescission of the contract; but where it appears that the deed to the grantor stated the number of acres in the tract to be but five hundred and forty-three, this fact was held to be evidence of the grantor's knowledge of the quantity contained in the tract; and equity will decree the grantor to repay to the grantee the average price per acre for the deficiency. McCoun v. Delany, 6 D. 635.

A purchaser of a specific tract of land, erroneously designated on a surveyor's map as containing a certain number of acres, cannot, in the absence of deceit or fraud on the part of the grantor, recover a proportionate part of the purchase price, upon discovering that there was a less quantity of land than that shown on the map, although the land was paid for at so much per acre. Farmers' & M. Bank v. Galbraith, 51 D. 498.

When there is a very great difference, as thirty-three per cent, for instance, between the actual and estimated quantity of acres of land sold in gross, courts of chancery everywhere will give relief on the ground of gross mistake. Harrell v. Hill, 68 D. 202.

An action at law for money had and received cannot be maintained to recover back the money paid for the number of acres alleged to be deficient, where there has been a material deficiency in the quantity of land conveyed by deed, describing it as so many acres, "more or less." The purchaser must resort to a court of equity to obtain relief on the ground of mistake. Smith v. Fly, 76 D. 109.

An action for a diminution of price for deficiency will not lie where land fronting on a bayou is sold by described metes and bounds, except the rear boundary, which is not defined, as containing a certain number of arpents. In such case the sale is one per aversionem, the depth of the land is presumed to be forty arpents, and the vendee takes all the land within the boundaries mentioned. Davis v. Millaudon, 87 D. 517.

Where a contract for the sale of land is fully executed and the purchase-money paid, the vendee cannot maintain an action for a deficiency in the quantity without proof of fraud or mutual mistake. Kreiter v. Bomberger, 22 R. 750.

Where, upon a sale of land, the quantity is made an essential element of the bargain, and is relied on to fix the price, and by mistake of fact there is a deficiency in the quantity paid for and purporting to be conveyed, the excess of payment may be recovered at law, but not in equity. Pickman v. Trinity Church, 25 R. 1.

The rule that the title to land cannot be tried in an action for money had and received is not applicable where the action does not involve the title to the lands for which such money was paid, but only of lands of a third party upon which those lands are bounded. Ib.

Land was sold at a fixed price per square foot; the grantee, relying upon a survey, procured by the grantor, paid the agreed price for the quantity thus indicated; the deed stated the same sum as its consideration, purported to state the true length of the lines and the correct number of square feet, and bounded the grant on one side by T.'s land; whether the amount was correctly stated depended on the question whether the grantor or T. owned a strip of land lying between lots conceded to be owned by them respectively, and conveyed by the deed in question. Held, that if T. owned the strip, an action for money had and received would lie to recover the excess of the price paid, but that a bill in equity would not. Ib.

70. Action to recover back purchase-money. — The cases where the vendee of real estate may recover back moneys paid by him under a contract for its purchase are: 1. Where the rescission is voluntary by mutual consent, and without default on either side; 2. Where vendor cannot or will not perform contract on his part; 3. Where vendor has been guilty of fraud in making the contract; 4. Where by terms of contract it is left in power of vendee to rescind by act on his part, and he does it; 5. Where neither party is ready at the stipulated time, but each is in default. Boston v. Clifford, 18 R. 547.

If a purchaser pay a portion of the purchase price of lands, and the contract of sale be not enforceable because within the statute of frauds, he has a lien on the property to secure the repayment of the amount paid.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

He has not the right to retain the possession until paid out of the rents, but is entitled to a decree for the sale of a quantity sufficient to cover his lien. McC Campbell v. McC Campbell, 15 D. 48. S. P., Wickman v. Robinson, 80 D. 789.

A purchaser of real estate cannot recover back the purchase-money in an action for money had and received, where the title proves defective, unless there be fraud or warranty. Dorsey v. Jackman, 7 D. 611.

An encumbrance discovered before the execution of the conveyance must be discharged by the vendor, whether there be an agreement to covenant against it or not, unless it be contingent; and then if it be agreed in the articles that the vendor shall covenant against it, the vendee having reserved that particular remedy, shall not resort to the additional one of detaining the purchase-money. But if actually evicted, he may detain or recover it back, though the intended covenants would not have extended to the particular encumbrance or defect by which the eviction was occasioned. Lighty v. Shorb, 24 D. 334.

A purchaser having paid money on a contract within the statute of frauds, either to the vendor or to a third person, to be paid to him on the execution of a conveyance, cannot recover the same on the ground of the invalidity of the contract, if the vendor is ready and willing to perform it. Coughlin v. Knowles, 39 D. 759; Sims v. Hutchins, 47 D. 90; Cobb v. Hall, 70 D. 432; Galway v. Shields, 27 R. 351; Day v. Wilson, 43 R. 76. But see Scott v. Bush, 12 R. 311.

Money paid in part performance of a parol contract for the purchase of land can only be recovered on the ground of the unwillingness or inability of the vendor to convey according to contract, or of a mutual abandonment of the contract. Sims v. Hutchins, 47 D. 90.

A vendee paying money with a privilege of refusing to complete the purchase may recover the money back in an action of assumpsit upon such refusal. Johnson v. Evans, 50 D. 669.

A vendee's executor is a proper party complainant to demand relief in equity against a fraudulent vendor, where the only relief to be obtained is a return of the purchase-money, and no descendible or transmissible interest in the land under the purchase remained in the vendee. Bryant v. Boothe, 68 D. 117.

The vendee's executor is not barred of relief against a fraudulent vendor by becoming the purchaser at a sale previously made under order of the probate court, when all the vendee's right and interest in the land had been extinguished prior thereto. Ib.

In assumpsit, the grantee may recover against the grantor, in whole or in part, the price of land not conveyed to him, and in such case parol proof is admissible to show that the purchase price has been paid and a conveyance refused. Goodspeed v. Fuller, 71 D. 572.

The vendee need not tender the balance of the purchase-money for land before he can maintain an action against the vendor to recover back the money paid on his contract, when the vendor admits that he has not the title and could not convey. Smith v. Lamb, 79 D. 381.

Where land agreed to be conveyed is to be paid for in services, and the vendor refuses to perform his agreement after the vendee has performed part of his contract, the amount for which the latter will have a lien thereon is the value of the services actually performed, estimated according to the contract price. Wickman v. Robinson, 80 D. 789.

An action will not lie in favor of a vendee in an executory contract for the sale of lands, to recover a portion of the purchase-money paid by him, where the buildings on the land had been destroyed by fire, without the vendor's fault, after such payment and before the payment of the balance, it not appearing that the buildings formed the chief inducement to the purchase. Bautz v. Kuhworth, 25 R. 737.

C. agreed to purchase and B. to sell certain lands, C. to pay the purchase price in installments, for which he gave notes, B., upon the payment of the last due note at maturity, to execute to C. a deed of the lands. C. paid all but the last note. When that was due, he was not ready to pay it, but B. did not prepare and tender a deed of the land. Thereafter B. surrendered the last note to C., and sold the land to another party. Held, that B., not having executed and tendered to C. a deed at the maturity of the last payment, failed to put C. in legal default, was equally derelict with him, and, having sold the land, C. was entitled to recover back the amounts previously paid under the contract. Boston v. Clifford, 18 R. 547.

71. Action for relief against payment of purchase-money. — A court of equity will grant relief where the vendor of real estate, by false and fraudulent representations respecting its quality, induces another to purchase it, when he was not in a situation to ascertain its quality by ordinary diligence, and where adequate remedy at law cannot be had. Sherwood v. Salmon, 5 D. 167.

A purchaser of land warranted by the vendor to be free of all encumbrance, will not be denied relief in equity against his bond for the purchase-money, because of the fact that before making the purchase he was fully apprised of the encumbrance. Stockton v. Cook, 5 D. 504.

A purchaser of land who is in undisputed possession, and has received a conveyance of the same with warranty, cannot have relief in equity against payment of the purchase-money, on the ground of a defect in the title. Abbott v. Allen, 7 D. 554. S. P., Coleman v. Rowe, 37 D. 164; Vick v. Percy, 45 D. 303.

Failure of title to land sold, if there be no fraud or warranty, furnishes no ground for equitable relief against a contract for the payment of the purchase-money. Barkhamsted v. Case, 13 D. 92.

Where there has been a partial failure of consideration in a sale of lands, the remedy is, in general, in equity. Parham v. Randolph, 35 D. 403.

A purchaser is entitled to relief in equity on the ground of fraud, although he has taken a covenant from his vendor which covers the precise injury sustained. Cullum v. Branch Bank, 37 D. 725.

Relief in equity will be given a purchaser of lands against his obligation to pay the purchase-money, if it appear that he holds under a conveyance, with covenants of warranty, that he has been evicted by title paramount, and that his grantor is insolvent. Cullum v. Branch Bank, 37 D. 725. S. P., Woodruff v. Bunce, 38 D. 559.

Fraud on the part of the vendor may entitle the vendee to relief in equity, as where the former, being aware of a defect in the title, concealed it from the latter, or suppressed an instrument by which an encumbrance had been created. Cullum v. Branch Bank, 37 D. 725.

Equity will not grant relief to a vendee in possession, with covenants of warranty, in the absence of fraud or eviction, but will grant such relief when the vendor or his personal representatives have agreed to an abatement in the purchase price. Elliott v. Thompson, 40 D. 630.

A vendee will not be granted an injunction against a suit for the purchase-money on ground of vendor's misrepresentation as to the productiveness of the property. Collier v. Harkness, 71 D. 216.

Where a contract was made to sell a tract of land stated to contain a number of acres, more or less, and it afterward turns out there is less than the quantity stated, the purchaser will not be relieved in equity. Jolliffe v. Hite, 1 D. 519.

Where a contract was made for the sale of nine hundred acres of land, more or less, and the tract is found to contain only seven hundred and sixty-five acres, the purchaser will be relieved in equity, it appearing that the seller knew of the deficiency at the time of the sale, but did not disclose it. Bedford v. Hickman, 2 D. 590.

In case of a sale of land by the acre, relief is to be granted for all deficiencies not reasonably imputable to the variation of instruments, and small errors in surveys, whether the purchaser has expressly retained an election to have the tract surveyed or not. Nelson v. Carrington, 6 D. 519.

72. Action for fraud or deceit. — 1. When the action lies. — Where a person was induced to purchase land upon the false and fraudulent representation that a certain privilege was annexed thereto, but which is not included in the deed, he may maintain an action on the case against the grantor. Monell v. Colden, 7 D. 390.

A false representation by the vendor, by which the vendee is induced to purchase land, need not be proved to have been made by the vendor knowing it to be false, to entitle the vendee to recover damages. Munroe v. Pritchett, 50 D. 203.

A party who undertakes to sell land which he has already conveyed to another is, in construction of law, responsible for a fraud upon the purchaser, although at the time he made the second deed he had forgotten that he had executed the prior conveyance, and had no intention to deceive or defraud the second purchaser. Alvarez v. Brannan, 68 D. 274.

A vendor of land who knowingly misrepresents material facts will not be permitted to derive any benefit from the transaction; but the injured party has, in such a case, the right to elect to rescind the contract and recover the purchase-money, or to proceed upon the covenants in his deed. Ib.

A vendor is guilty of fraud if he conceals a defect in title to land, which does not appear on the face of the title deeds; and the vendee may either bring an action on the case or file a bill in equity for relief. Bryant v. Boothe, 68 D. 117.

The measure of equitable relief for fraudulent concealment by the vendor of a defect in title to government land, in consequence of which the vendor's entry of the land was vacated and canceled, is a return of the purchase-money, with interest thereon, and the value of the vendee's improvements made on the land, less the rents and profits of the land. Ib.

2. When it does not. — Where a vendor misrepresents the value of land lying in a neighboring county, the vendee cannot maintain an action for deceit though he has never seen the land, as he has it in his power to ascertain its value. Saunders v. Hatterman, 37 D. 404.

Fraudulent misrepresentations of a vendor of real estate as to the price which he paid therefor are not actionable. Holbrook v. Connor, 11 R. 212.

False representations as to the condition, situation, and value of real estate, knowingly made by the vendor to the purchaser, are not actionable, unless the purchaser has been fraudulently induced to forbear inquiry as to their truth; and in such case, the means by which he has been thus induced to forbear inquiry must be specifically set forth in the declaration. Parker v. Moulton, 19 R. 315.

3. Illustrations. — A master and commissioners in partition parted a decedent's land and laid out a street bounding on the line of an adjoining land-holder. Afterwards, but before the partition was put upon record, or the street opened, the latter laid out a town plat, which was lithographed. It exhibited the street, with streets on his own plat opening into it, but the seller gave no information that the first-named street was on his neighbor's land. He sold lots at auction according to the plat, which was exhibited on the day of sale. The plat of the commissioners was afterwards set aside, and the street vacated. Held, that the vendor was liable for damages to a vendee of lots; for diminution in the value thereof, caused by the non-existence of the vacated street. McCall v. Davis, 94 D. 92.

The defendant made a conveyance of land to the plaintiff, not actually including a certain lot of seventeen acres, which defendant had represented and plaintiff had been led to believe to be covered by the deed. By a proviso in the deed, plaintiff assumed the burden of maintaining a line fence, being induced to consent to the proviso by false representations of the defendant in regard to the amount of fence which his neighbors would be obliged to maintain. Part of the purchase-money for the land was paid in government bonds, the defendant agreeing to take them at par and pay the interest and premium, and there was a considerable sum due to the plaintiff thereon. By a bill in equity, the plaintiff prayed that the defendant be compelled to convey the additional seventeen acres, to release plaintiff from the proviso, and to pay the amount due on the bonds. Held, that the conveyance prayed for could not be decreed; that the remedy relating to the proviso and to the bonds was adequate at law; and that, as the plaintiff did not offer to rescind the whole contract, there was no remedy in equity. Glass v. Hulbert, 3 R. 418.

The vendor of land represented to the purchaser, who had never seen it, lived at a distance of seven miles from it, and was unacquainted with its value, that he had been offered twelve hundred dollars for it, and fraudulently procured a third person to corroborate his statement. The offer was fictitious, and payable in property either worthless or at greatly exaggerated values. The land was worth much less than the price paid. Held, that the vendor was liable in damages to the vendee for the fraud. Kenner v. Harding, 28 R. 615.

73. Other remedies of the purchaser. — A person properly entitled to the custody of title deeds of his estate may come into equity and obtain a decree for a specific delivery of them if they be wrongfully withheld. Snoddy v. Finch, 70 D. 216.

A bill to obtain a specific delivery of title deeds should allege danger of loss or destruction of the deeds in the keeping of him who withholds them. Ib.

A power of attorney is an essential part of a conveyance by attorney, and the grantee may maintain a bill against the attorney for its specific delivery; but since other purchasers from the attorney may need the instrument to establish the agency, the court will decree that the defendant deposit it with the register of the court for the use of all interested. Ib.

3. Rescission.

74. General principles. — A contract in relation to land will not be rescinded in part and enforced in part; but if, in entering into such contract, a defect in the land has been fraudulently concealed from one of the parties by the other, such party may have it entirely rescinded, or he may recover compensation for the defect so concealed. Jopling v. Dooley, 24 D. 450; Bailey v. James, 62 D. 659.

A written agreement for the sale of land may be discharged by a parol agreement between the parties, without canceling the articles or surrendering possession so as to defeat an ejectment to enforce specific performance brought by the vendee against subsequent purchasers from the vendor. Boyce v. McCulloch, 39 D. 35.

One party cannot rescind without the other's consent, express or implied, a contract for the sale of land, where there was no appearance of fraud on either side, and the contract did not reserve to one party the right to put an end to it, and it was not subject to any express or implied condition, the breach of which would confer such a right. Fay v. Oliver, 49 D. 764.

A contract rescinded ab initio as to part, and at the election of one party, must be wholly rescinded; consequently an entire contract for the sale of two distinct parcels of land for a single sum, which has been partly executed by the giving of a deed for one of the tracts, cannot be rescinded by the grantee as to the other tract, unless the contract is wholly rescinded. Ib.

Acquiescence of the vendee in a rescission of the contract cannot be inferred where he proposes to pay the consideration with the highest rate of interest, and brings suit for specific performance before the vendor indicates any intention of declaring the contract at an end. Young v. Daniels, 63 D. 477.

A mistake in a representation of fact material to a contract is sufficient ground for setting it aside. Alvarez v. Brannan, 68 D. 274.

It seems that, as a general rule, a delay to rescind, after discovery of the fraud, does not operate as a waiver of the right, or as a confirmation of the fraudulent contract. Baker v. Lever, 23 R. 117.

75. Grounds for rescission by vendor. — Where money is not paid at the day appointed, by a purchaser of land, and he thereupon agrees that if the whole is not paid by a certain future day, all prior payments shall be forfeited, and the agreement be at an end, the vendor is not at liberty to rescind the contract upon non-payment at such future day. Decamp v. Feay, 9 D. 372.

Where, on the sale of land, part of the purchase-money is paid, and notes for the balance are executed, and the vendor gives to the vendee a bond to convey the title to him upon the punctual payment of the notes, and the vendee goes into possession, the contract is mutual and dependent, and the vendor cannot put an end to it without performance or a valid offer to perform on his part. Johnson v. Jackson, 61 D. 522.

Failure of the obligee in a bond for title to pay the purchase price agreed does not absolutely and of itself put an end to the contract. Walker v. Emerson, 73 D. 207.

The rights of a vendee under a contract for conveyance of land upon payment of purchase-money cannot be forfeited by the vendor, though default has been made in the payment of the price, while he has no title to convey, and is not in a position to perform his part of the contract. Converse v. Blumrich, 90 D. 230.

Where parcels of land, not intended to be sold, are included in a deed through the fraud of the vendee, and no part of the consideration is paid or received on account thereof, the vendor may set up the fraud and avoid the conveyance of those parcels without returning the consideration paid or setting aside the entire deed. Bartlett v. Drake, 1 R. 101.

Where an agreement for the sale of land is conditioned to be void if the vendee shall fail to fulfill, and the vendee so fails, the vendor may treat it as void or as in force. Wilcoxon v. Stitt, 52 R. 310.

76. Necessary steps prior to rescission by vendor. — Rescission of an executory contract for the sale of lands is sufficiently indicated by the re-entry of the vendor upon the land, after a default in the payments, and his conveyance of the land to another. Castleberry v. Peirce, 24 D. 774.

Where a vendee contracts for the purchase of land and takes possession, but fails to pay a portion of the purchase-money for nine months after it is due, and the vendor during all the time holds the vendee's bonds for its payment, without offering to surrender them, and recognizes the contract as still subsisting, after the default, the latter cannot put an end to the contract without a formal and reasonable notice that if the purchaser will not fulfill it, he will not hold himself further bound. Falls v. Carpenter, 28 D. 592.

Such vendee may, upon paying the amount due, enforce specific performance from the vendor, or from a person who purchased with notice of the existence of such contract. Ib.

The vendor cannot rescind the contract and claim payment under it at the same time. Hence, where, after part payment, the purchaser, pursuant to an oral agreement, gives his note, with the vendor as surety, for a certain debt of the vendor in payment of the balance, with the understanding that the vendor is to hold the title as security, and that if he has to pay the note, the original debt shall be still due, and the vendor, having paid the note, recovers the land from a vendee of the purchaser, he cannot claim the balance of the purchase-money from the deceased purchaser's estate, but must refund the part already paid, which is to be set off against his claim as surety. Davis v. Smith, 48 D. 279.

The vendor cannot abandon the contract without refunding to the vendee the money paid by the latter in part performance of it. Johnson v. Jackson, 61 D. 522.

Where the vendor who has reserved a right to declare a forfeiture for default of payment does so declare such forfeiture, the vendee may prevent the forfeiture by immediately tendering the amount due. Hall v. Delaplaine, 68 D. 57.

Where the declaration of forfeiture for non-payment of purchase-money was mailed by vendors of land at Madison, Wisconsin, to the vendees at Tiffin, Ohio, on the 19th of March, tender of the purchase-money on the 30th of the same month would be in time to save the forfeiture. Ib.

Vendors reserving an option to declare the contract void for default in payment at stipulated time must, to avail themselves of the reservation, declare their option at the time of the default. Ib.

Lapse of time alone cannot terminate contracts for sale of land conditioned to be void at the election of the vendor upon the failure of the vendee to fulfill the covenants, conditions, and agreements thereof; for time is not of the essence of the undertaking to pay money by such contracts, and default in payment must be followed by some act of the vendor indicating his election to consider the contract at an end. Converse v. Blumrich, 90 D. 230.

77. Grounds for rescission by purchaser. — 1. *Generally. — A purchaser is entitled to rescind a contract for the sale of real estate, if such estate is taken from him in consequence of an encumbrance made by his vendor and unknown to him at the time of the purchase. Cullum v. Branch Bank, 37 D. 725.

A sale without warranty of an equitable interest in realty claimed under a contract of sale of such equitable interest implies an undertaking that such contract was made by one competent to contract; and where the contrary proves true, it is ground for the rescission of the sale. Bailey v. James, 62 D. 659.

A vendee in possession of land before conveyance has no right to rescind his contract of purchase, there being no eviction by title paramount. Gale v. Green, 12 D. 548.

A purchaser has no right to rescind a contract for the purchase of land because it was not reduced to writing, if the vendor has complied with his contract, or is willing to do so. Rosland v. Garman, 19 D. 54.

The vendee cannot rescind a contract induced by fraud, after disposing of the property, by offering to restore what he received for it, although he disposed of the property before the discovery of the fraud. His remedy is an action for damages, or a reduction from the contract price to the same extent, if that is yet unpaid. McCrillis v. Carlton, 86 D. 700.

Where a vendor of lands executed to his vendee a bond for a deed, in which he agreed to execute a deed to his vendee in sixty days from the date thereof, without any conditions, and received the vendee's note for the remainder of the purchase-money, with a power of attorney to confess judgment, and at the expiration of sixty days offered to make a deed, if the vendee would execute a mortgage to secure the unpaid note, which the vendee refused to do, and the vendor, not having complied with the conditions of his bond, afterwards obtained judgment by confession on the note in a foreign county, without notice, and the vendee not having exercised any right of ownership over the land, nor by any subsequent act committed himself to a performance on his part, — held, that the vendee had a right to treat the contract as rescinded, and to enjoin the collection of the judgment. The vendee had a right to insist upon the contract as it was made; and the offer to make a deed imposing conditions would be the same as if no offer of a deed had ever been made. Cooper v. Tyler, 95 D. 442.

2. Inability of vendor to convey title contracted for. — Where a party purchases land with a view of acquiring a certain right or privilege thereto attached, and where it happens that the vendor is unable fully to secure such right or privilege as warranted, the vendee will be entitled to a total rescission of the contract, or an adequate abatement of the price paid. Lide v. Thomas, 4 D. 581.

Where by the conditions of the contract the purchaser is required to deposit part of the purchase-money, and the vendor is unable to convey a good title, pursuant to the articles, the purchaser may disaffirm the contract, and recover back his deposit. Judson v. Wass, 6 D. 392; Dwretts v. Simpson, 16 D. 115.

The vendee may rescind for vendor's inability to convey, and recover the money paid on the contract in an action for money had and received. Smith v. Lamb, 79 D. 381; and this without first tendering to the vendor the purchase-money due, and demanding a deed; and the vendee may exercise this right where the vendor has permitted a mortgage executed by him, and existing at the time of the purchase, to be foreclosed, and the land sold thereunder. Wilhelm v. Fimple, 7 R. 117.

Where the contract provided that the conveyance was to be with warranty, except as to an encumbrance specified therein, the existence of an unsatisfied mortgage at the time the vendor should have conveyed, and although such mortgage was recorded, was held to exonerate the purchaser. Judson v. Wass, 6 D. 392.

If on a sale of land in separate lots and parcels to one person, the title to one or more of such lots fails, the vendee cannot rescind in toto, but he must accept a conveyance for such of the lots as the vendor is authorized to convey. Van Eps v. Schenectady, 7 D. 330.

If, at the time of a contract for the sale of land, there is a lease outstanding, unknown to the vendee, the latter may rescind, as the vendor is not in a situation to give a perfect title. Tucker v. Woods, 7 D. 305.

Where a vendor fails for a great length of time to make title according to his bond, the purchaser may either sue at law for the breach, or in equity for rescission. Humble v. Hinkson, 13 D. 195.

An agreement to convey in fee-simple is satisfied by a conveyance without covenants. Hence the existence of a judgment against the vendor will not, at law, authorize the vendee to rescind the contract. Fuller v. Hubbard, 16 D. 423.

The time fixed for performance is, at law, of the essence of the contract, and if the vendor is not ready to perform his agreement at the time stipulated, the purchaser may elect to consider the contract as terminated. Tyler v. Young, 35 D. 116.*

Failure of title to one undivided seventh of land, purported to be conveyed with two other undivided sevenths, for a specific sum, is ground for the rescission of the entire contract, but the contract being entire, it cannot be rescinded in part and enforced as to the residue; and if the vendee decline to rescind the entire contract, he must pay the whole purchase-money. Bailey v. James, 62 D. 659.

3. Deficiency in quantity. — A purchaser is entitled to have a contract for the sale of land rescinded, where there is a great deficiency in the quantity of land agreed to be conveyed. Glover v. Smith, 1 D. 687.

A purchaser of land who discovers, upon receiving the conveyance, that a part of it has previously been sold, may either keep the part conveyed and claim compensation for the residue, or reject the conveyance and seek compensation for the whole. Carneal v. May, 12 D. 453.

4. Misrepresentations, generally. — Misrepresentation on a plat of land, produced at the time and place of a public sale, is a good ground for rescinding the contract; as in the case where a fine stream of water is laid down with a good mill-seat on it, in the center of a tract of woodland only fit for lumber, and which stream, upon examination, turned out to be only a dry gully three fourths of a year, without any running water in it. State v. Gaillard, 1 D. 628.

Where the vendor of land misrepresents the location of its boundaries to the vendee at the time of the sale, the sale will be set aside in equity, notwithstanding the representation was innocently made. Bibb v. Prather, 2 D. 711.

Where a grantor represented that the land conveyed comprised a certain spring, knowing such representation to be false, by reason of which the grantee was deceived in regard to the location of the premises, equity will set aside the conveyance. Walker v. Dunlop, 9 D. 787.

Chancery will rescind a contract for purchase of land, where the vendor represented to the vendee that a field of forty acres of rich bottom land on an adjoining tract was included in the purchase, although such vendor had been previously informed by the owner of such tract that he had run out the line between them with a pocket-compass, and had ascertained that the field belonged to him. Camp v. Camp, 36 D. 423.

A statement in an agreement for the sale of land, "to embrace two hundred acres at the harbor of Elk Creek, best suited for the site of a city," will be construed to be a representation that there was a harbor there, which, if untrue, will vitiate the contract on the ground of fraud. Miles v. Stevens, 45 D. 621.

Equity will rescind a contract for sale of land when the vendor has fraudulently misrepresented the number of acres contained in the tract. Yost v. Shaffer, 56 D. 509.

The vendor cannot deprive the vendee of his right to have the contract rescinded in equity because of the vendor's fraudulent misrepresentations as to the quantity of land sold, by afterwards purchasing and offering to convey to the vendee an adjoining tract sufficient to make up the deficiency. Ib.

Equity will rescind a contract for sale of land on the ground of fraud practiced on the vendee, where at the time of the sale the vendor represented to the vendee that the land was good for agricultural purposes, above the influence of the waters of the river, and not subject to overflow, except from the backwater of a certain bayou, although he knew at the time that the land was subject to general overflow, which diminished its value, the purchaser being at the time unable to ascertain from appearances whether the land was subject to overflow or not. Alexander v. Beresford, 61 D. 538.

The vendee, upon discovery of the fraud, may rescind the contract, and bring action to recover what he has paid upon it in money, services, or materials, whether the contract be by parol or in writing. Brown v. Manning, 74 D. 736.

A contract for sale of land is tainted with fraud, and void, where the vendor, by making representations to the vendee about the ownership or possession of the land, which he knew to be false, induced him to enter into a contract which he otherwise would not have made, and which is to his damage. Ib.

The mere giving of a deed to the vendee while there is a deed on record of the same land to another does not per se constitute fraud on the part of the vendor, for it may, and frequently does happen that it would be perfectly safe for the vendee to take the deed and rely upon his covenants for his security. Ib.

5. Misrepresentations as to title. — Though there has been no eviction, equity will rescind a sale of lands, obtained by false representations that the title was good, whereas there was a superior outstanding title. And this though there are covenants of warranty to which the vendee might resort at law. Parham v. Randolph, 35 D. 403.

Where the vendor makes misrepresentations in relation to the title, though innocently and under a belief of their truth, and the vendee is thereby deceived to his prejudice, the latter is entitled, without previous eviction, to rescind. Rimer v. Dugan, 77 D. 687.

Where the owner of a tax title sells it representing it to be good, and the purchaser relies upon such representations, a relation of trust is created between the parties, which compels the vendor to exhibit the truth of the case as it exists, whether he knows it or not; and his ignorance of the truth, having undertaken truly to state it, will not redeem a falsehood regarding the title, in any material matter, from being a fraud which will avoid the sale. Babcock v. Case, 100 D. 654.

6. Concealment. — Where the vendor of a tract of land knows the inducement to the purchaser to be the acquisition of the elder title, and knows his grant to be of a junior date, and does not disclose the facts to the purchaser, the contract of sale will be rescinded. Kennedy v. Johnson, 4 D. 666.

A contract for the sale and purchase of land will be rescinded, where the vendor fails to disclose that the land was covered by two adverse claims and elder patents. Peebles v. Stephens, 6 D. 660.

A fraudulent concealment of the nature of the title by the vendor, or fraudulent representations with regard to it, are grounds for the rescission of the contract, although the title and encumbrances are of record. Campbell v. Whittingham, 20 D. 241.

The omission of vendor to disclose an encumbrance on land, where no fraud appears, and the vendee receives no injury, the encumbrancer releasing the encumbrance, presents no case for a rescission of contract. Ib.

78. Necessary steps prior to rescission by purchaser. — A vendee in a contract of purchase is not compelled to go out of the state to notify the vendor that he renounces the contract; he may abandon the possession without notice. Taylor v. Porter, 25 D. 155.

An agreement that a contract may be rescinded by a return of the deed by which it is evidenced by a certain day, cannot if the deed be lost, be fulfilled by the grantee's informing the grantor thereof, and further, that he renounces the benefit of the contract. Morrow v. Campbell, 31 D. 704.

Rescission of a contract for the sale of lands, by the vendee, does not follow, unless he performs, or offers to perform, on his part, and abandons the possession of the land to the vendor. Duncan v. Jeter, 39 D. 342. S. P., Smith v. Busby, 57 D. 207; Mecklem v. Blake, 99 D. 68.

The vendee is not bound to surrender possession prior to claiming a right to rescind, where large payments have been made by him upon the land, which he cannot recover from his vendor, owing to the latter's insolvency. Bryan v. Lofftus, 39 D. 242. S. P., Duncan v. Jeter, 39 D. 342.

The vendee may resort to chancery for rescission and yet retain possession of the land, as security for money paid, where the vendor is insolvent, and unable or unwilling to make the title. Greenlee v. Gaines, 48 D. 49.

The vendee is not bound to rescind as soon as an occasion arises, if his right to do so depends upon a continuing default upon the part of his vendor, as upon an inability of the latter to make the title for which he has covenanted, but may in such a case for a time waive his right, and afterwards, while the default yet continues, may assert it and rescind the contract. Bryan v. Lofftus, 39 D. 242.

To avoid a contract for purchase of land on the ground of fraud in the vendor, the vendee must repudiate the contract and demand its rescission immediately upon discovering the fraud; and if, after such discovery, he remains quietly in possession for a long time, he cannot afterwards avoid the contract. Blen v. Water etc. Co., 81 D. 132.

Where a vendee has been induced to purchase property by means of fraud on the part of the vendor, mere want of diligence in discovering the fraud does not deprive the vendee of his right to rescind because thereof; he owes the fraudulent vendor no duty of active vigilance, and if he acts promptly after actual discovery of the fraud, he has a perfect right to rescind. Baker v. Lever, 23 R. 117.

79. Matters of pleading and practice in suits for rescission. — A vendee desiring to rescind the contract need only show the inability of the vendor to perform it, and need not show tender of purchase-money on his own part. Runkle v. Johnson, 83 D. 191.

An averment of an offer to rescind would be established by proof that the opposite party had prevented or dispensed with a formal tender of a deed. Stille v. McDowell, 85 D. 590.

80. Effect of rescission. — On rescinding a contract the law requires that the parties should be placed in status quo, and it rests with the party objecting to the application of this rule to make out a clear case. Carneal v. May, 12 D. 453; Taylor v. Porter, 25 D. 155; Smith v. Brittain, 42 D. 175; and where possession has passed to the vendee, it should be restored, unless there has been a lawful and bona fide eviction. Humble v. Hinkson, 13 D. 195; Bryan v. Lofftus, 39 D. 242.

Upon the rescission of a contract for the sale of land for failure of the vendor to make the vendee a title as agreed, the former must take back the property without compensation for casual destruction, decay, or dilapidation of buildings, or other improvements, not caused by any negligent act or omission of the vendee; but the latter is liable if he has sold and removed, or wantonly injured or destroyed, such improvements. Taylor v. Porter, 25 D. 155.

Where one having agreed by parol to sell land rescinds the contract, the other party may maintain an action to recover back money paid him on account of the purchase. Gillet v. Maynard, 4 D. 329; Castleberry v. Peirce, 24 D. 774.

Where a vendee of land on failure of title, instead of suing on the bond, sues for cancellation of the contract, the heirs of the vendor are not liable, in respect of lands descended from their ancestor, to refund the purchase-money received by him in his lifetime, prior to 1792, but they are liable so far as they have received personal assets from the ancestor. Humble v. Hinkson, 13 D. 195.

A vendee whose contract is dissolved has a lien on the land for the purchase-money and interest, and for the value of his improvements, and should not be compelled to surrender possession without payment or security therefor. Griffith v. Depew, 13 D. 141. S. P., Flint v. Cuny, 26 D. 505; Bryan v. Loftus, 39 D. 242.

Upon the disaffirmance of the contract, the vendee is chargeable with rents until he surrenders possession, and is entitled to interest until his money is refunded. Taylor v. Porter, 25 D. 155.

Where there has been a partial payment by the vendee in such a contract, upon it being disaffirmed, there should be an equitable adjustment of rent and interest. Ib.

Where a contract for the sale of land is dissolved for the vendor's default, both the interest on the purchase-money and the rent should be reckoned from the time of filing the bill for dissolution of the contract. Griffith v. Depew, 13 D. 141.

Where, after the vendee has entered under a contract for the sale of land, the contract is rescinded on account of the misrepresentations of the vendor and his inability to make a good title, the vendee will not be obliged to pay rent beyond the profits actually received. Richardson v. McKinson, 12 D. 308.

Upon the rescission of a contract of sale of land, the vendee in possession is entitled to recover the value of lasting improvements made by him. Richardson v. McKinson, 12 D. 308; Griffith v. Depew, 13 D. 141; Bryan v. Loftus, 39 D. 242. But see Gillet v. Maynard, 4 D. 329.

A vendor, in consideration of the prompt payment of a sum of money, agreed to sell lands on condition that, in case of the failure of the vendee in the performance of all or either of the covenants on his part, the vendor should have the right to declare the contract void, and take immediate possession of the premises. In the construction of this contract, — held, that where the vendee enters upon the performance of the contract, and, paying part of the purchase-money, makes default which is inexcusable, and the vendor, being without default, exercises the right given by the contract of declaring the same terminated, and in doing so acts fairly and within the scope of the power, then no action can be maintained by the vendee to recover back what he has paid; but a vendor who is himself in fault for fraud or violation of his contract cannot exercise the power so given without making restoration of what he has received under it. In such case the law would imply a promise to repay the purchase-money received, and an action for money had and received would lie. Wheeler v. Mather, 8 R. 683.

WAGERS.

[Includes the validity of wagers or bets; the rights and liabilities of stakeholders; and suits founded upon wager considerations. The offense of gaming is under that title.]

Illegality of wager contracts, see CONTRACTS, 96.

Insurance policies in nature of, see INSURANCE, 10, 93.

1. What constitutes a wager. — Wagers at the common law were legal, and might be enforced, unless they were against public policy, or of an immoral tendency, which affected the feelings, interests, or character of a third party, or tended to disturb the peace of society. Stoddard v. Martin, 19 D. 643.

Wagers upon the result of an election give to one party a pecuniary interest in the election of a person to office, and to another the same interest in such person's defeat; consequently, such wagers are against public policy, and therefore invalid. Ib.

Elections are not games within the meaning of the statute against games and gambling devices. Hickerson v. Benson, 40 D. 115.

Bets previous to an election, upon its event, or made subsequently, upon matter connected with the canvass, are illegal and void, upon principles of public policy and morality. Ib.

An instrument given in payment of the purchase price of land, in which the vendee promises to pay to the vendor $902, if cotton should rise to eight cents by a certain time, and if not, to pay $500, is not a wager on the price of cotton. Ferguson v. Coleman, 45 D. 761.

"By," in such an agreement, must be construed to mean "on or before," and not "on or near." Ib.

Horse-racing is a game, within the meaning of the statute of Missouri to restrain gaming. Shropshire v. Glascock, 31 D. 189.

A contract to forfeit a certain amount in case of a failure to run a horse-race is a valid contract, and an action may be maintained upon a note given for such amount. Kirkland v. Randon, 58 D. 94.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume L.

A prize offered for a horse that will trot in the best time less than a given time is not a wager. Misner v. Knapp, 57 R. 6.

2. Invalidity, generally.* — Idle wagers and all gaming contracts may be properly held to be void. Monroe v. Smelly, 78 D. 541; and all wagers upon matters in which the parties have no interest beyond what is created by the wager itself. Hoit v. Hodge, 25 D. 451.

Wagers upon an abstract question of law, not arising out of pre-existing circumstances, or upon the manner in which public officials have executed their trust, although not immoral per se, will not be enforced by a court of law. Smith v. Brown, 49 D. 748.

Wagers contrary to principles of morality or sound policy are not recoverable. Rust v. Gott, 18 D. 497. Therefore, an action upon a check shown to have been given in pursuance of a bet cannot be maintained. Edgell v. McLaughlin, 36 D. 214.

Wagers are recoverable, unless prohibited by statute, contrary to public policy, or calculated to affect the interest, character, or feelings of third parties. Johnson v. Fall, 65 D. 518.

A wager that a railroad will not be completed within a given time is valid at common law, and not prohibited by the laws of Illinois as having an immoral, indecent, or illegal tendency. Beadles v. Bless, 81 D. 231. And questions as to its effect upon the advancement of the work, and upon the interests of the public or of third parties are questions of fact, which cannot be decided on demurrer. Johnson v. Fall, 65 D. 518.

A wager on the event of an election, being against principles of public policy, is void, and no action can be maintained for its recovery. Burns v. Riker, 4 D. 292; Jeffrey v. Ficklin, 36 D. 456; though made after the election, but before the canvass is completed; because the tendency is to promote inquiry into the legality of elections, and thus to excite discontent and possible disturbances among the people. Rust v. Gott, 18 D. 497.

A wager as to the result of a presidential election in another state, made after the vote has been cast, is not void as being against public policy. Such a wager was not void at common law, and is not forbidden by the Illinois statute. Smith v. Smith, 74 D. 100.

A wager on the result of a presidential election is, in Vermont, wholly illegal, and if made in Canada by citizens of this state, for the purpose of evading our laws, is as invalid as if made here. Tarleton v. Baker, 44 D. 358.

A wager on a horse-race is void as against morals and public policy. Gridley v. Dorn, 40 R. 110; Dunman v. Strother, 46 D. 97.

A check given to an agricultural society to enable the drawer to enter his horse in competition in "a trial of speed" at an exhibition, for a premium offered by the society, is void under the statute against wagers and horse-racing. Comly v. Hillegass, 39 R. 774.

A wager as to whether an execution can be collected is not "gaming," nor a wager upon a "game," but is void as against public policy, as between the original parties, but valid as to a bona fide transferee of a check given therefor. Boughner v. Meyer, 40 R. 139.

3. Action to recover back.* — Money bet on an election which is paid over by the stakeholder to the winner, contrary to the orders of the loser, after the result of the election is known, may be recovered back. McAllister v. Hoffman, 16 D. 556.

Horse-racing or horse-trotting is a game within the statute "to prevent gaming for money or other property." And money lost by betting on a trotting-match may be recovered back by the loser. The statute, with respect to the party losing, is remedial, not penal. Ellis v. Berle, 36 D. 726.

4. When the action will not lie. — Bet or wager lost, and the money or property delivered to the winner, courts will not aid in its recovery, both parties being equally derelict. Allen v. Dodd, 40 D. 632; Hockaday ad. Willis, 40 D. 606; Downs v. Quarles, 12 D. 337; unless made recoverable by statute. Stacy v. Foss, 36 D. 755; Allen v. Dodd, 40 D. 632; Babcock v. Thompson, 15 D. 235.

The title of goods lost at play and paid down is good in the hands of the winner, even against the loser, after expiration of three months. Hockaday ad. Willis, 40 D. 606.

Plaintiff and defendant made a wager as to the result of a presidential election, in another state, and deposited the money with a stakeholder. The plaintiff lost, and the stakeholder paid the money to the defendant. In an action to recover the money back, — held, 1. That the wager was against public policy and void; 2. That the plaintiff could not recover back the money. Gregory v. King, 11 R. 56.

5. Who may sue. — A statute provided that any person who lost money to another in gaming might recover it. Held, not to apply to a proprietor of a faro bank who lost money to persons betting against the bank. Brown v. Thompson, 29 R. 416.

A statute giving a right of action for money lost at gaming, to the loser, "or any other person," does not include the loser's wife. Moore v. Settle, 56 R. 889.

6. Position of stakeholders. — A stakeholder of money wagered upon the result of an election cannot pay over the money lawfully, in opposition to the order of his principal; nor can he refuse to deliver

* See note on the validity of wagers, 11 R. 58, 59.

* See note on actions on wagers, 12 R. 339, 340.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

up the wager if demanded before the determination of the final result of the election. Jeffrey v. Ficklin, 36 D. 456.

Where one gives money to another to bet upon an election, and latter so uses it by depositing it with a stakeholder, this is an illegal act, but the party depositing it may retract his illegal act. The money is not forfeited for the benefit of the stakeholder, but he holds it as bailee of the depositor, who may resume it at any time before it is paid over to the winner. Hardy v. Hunt, 70 D. 787.

Money in hands of a stakeholder, wagered on an election, is a deposit without consideration, subject to be reclaimed by the depositor on demand, or to attachment by his creditors, at any time before it is paid over, whether such money belonged to the depositor or was given to him for the purpose of being staked, betting on elections being prohibited by statute. Reynolds v. McKinney, 89 D. 602.

Notice to a stakeholder by one of the parties to a wager, to retain the money deposited in his hands, arrests it, and he may not afterwards pay over the money to either, whatever the determination of the event upon which depends the wager. Shackleford v. Ward, 36 D. 435.

A stakeholder is not a party in interest to a contract, nor is he always necessarily apprised of the nature of the contract between the parties depositing money with him. Alford v. Burke, 68 D. 449.

A stakeholder is bound to pay a deposit to the party entitled to it, without any express promise by him, as the law implies one if the contract was legal between the parties making the deposit. Ib.

Parties to an illegal and void contract may disaffirm it, and claim from the stakeholder their deposits. Ib.

A stakeholder cannot set up in defense the illegal contract when defending against a party who claims his deposit. Ib.

A stakeholder cannot assume the position of one of parties to contract, and call on the court to recognize its validity and sustain the title of the other party to the money. Ib.

Neither a stakeholder nor a party to the illegal contract can set it up as a test of his right to recover; and although the stakeholder might retain the deposit as against the winner, the winner may, by repudiating the contract, recover his deposit from the stakeholder on his refusal to pay. Ib.

A stakeholder is the proper person to decide who has won a wager, unless the parties have fixed upon some other tribunal to determine that question. Smith v. Smith, 74 D. 100.

7. Their liabilities. — Money held by a stakeholder on a bet may be recovered by the depositor, provided he notifies him before delivery of the stakes not to pay over.

Gilmore v. Woodcock, 31 R. 255. S. P., Wilkinson v. Tousley, 10 R. 139; Bledsoe v. Thompson, 57 D. 777; Tarleton v. Baker, 44 D. 358; Hickerson v. Benson, 40 D. 115; Stacy v. Foss, 36 D. 755.

The rule that a person may declare his dissent from an illegal wager before the event happens, and recover back his money, does not apply if the relative condition and chance of the two parties is materially changed, or the value of the risk is greatly altered; then the rule potior conditio defendentis prevails. Hickerson v. Benson, 40 D. 118.

The New York statute to prevent betting and gaming gives the party to a wager an unconditional right to recover his stake from the stakeholder. The fact that the stakeholder, after the determination of the wager, paid the stakes to the winner by direction or consent of the loser, is no defense to an action afterwards brought by the latter, under the statute. Storey v. Brennan, 69 D. 629.

A special demand on a stakeholder is not necessary, before instituting suit to recover the money deposited, if he has informed the depositor that he has paid over the money which it is sought to recover, to the other party to the wager, in opposition to instructions previously given. Shackleford v. Ward, 36 D. 435.

Where a wager is made on the result of a public election, and the stakeholder pays the stake after the result is generally known and publicly announced, but before the issue of the official certificate, the loser, having, after the payment, but before the issue of the certificate, notified him not to pay, may maintain an action against him for his stake. Lewis v. Bruton, 49 R. 816.

An action will not lie against a stakeholder of an election bet by the losing party, if the stakeholder has paid over the money, after the election, in good faith to the winner. Bates v. Lancaster, 51 D. 696.

Plaintiff and another deposited money with defendant, as stakeholder, upon an unlawful wager. Plaintiff, claiming to have won, demanded the entire deposit of defendant; but defendant refused to comply with the demand, and paid the money to the other party. In an action by plaintiff to recover the amount deposited by him, — held, that plaintiff's right was not defeated by the fact that his demand covered the whole amount of the stake, and was made an affirmance of the wager. Hale v. Sherwood, 16 R. 37.

A joint action to recover money deposited on an illegal wager cannot be maintained against the stakeholder by several contributors to the fund. Mytinger v. Springer, 38 D. 774.

A stakeholder paying over money without the consent of a majority of the judges, is liable to the winner, in case he cannot collect the bet from the loser. Dauterive v. Broussard, 39 D. 550.

Where a principal places his money in hands of agent to bet upon election, and it is so used by the agent, who deposits it with a stakeholder, where it is attached by the creditors of the agent, and the stakeholder was cited to appear before the justice's court out of which the attachment issued, and knowing the facts, he stated them, whereupon a judgment was rendered that he pay the money over to the creditors, which he did, the principal may maintain an action against the stakeholder for the money, and the judgment of the justice's court is no protection to him, as he should have defended against the same in some manner, interpleaded, or appealed therefrom. Hardy v. Hunt, 70 D. 787.

8. Claims founded upon gaming considerations. — A bond given for money won at horse-racing, or to secure a forfeiture for failure to run a horse-race, is void. Shropshire v. Glascock, 31 D. 189.

A bond given to secure payment of money lost by betting on an election is void, as being against public policy, although neither of the parties were voters. Bettie v. Reynolds, 55 D. 417.

A bond given to indemnify a stakeholder against all liability for giving up to the winner money deposited with him on an election bet is void, and no action can be sustained thereon. Columbia B. & B. Co. v. Haldeman, 42 D. 229. But if the bond be assigned to a bona fide purchaser for value, and the obligor convey to him, neither he nor his heirs or representatives can afterwards question the consideration, where the statute against gaming violates deeds only in the hands of the winner. Chiles v. Coleman, 12 D. 396.

A court of equity will not enjoin a judgment at law rendered on a promissory note given for the price of a horse originally lost at gaming, and actually delivered to the winner, but afterwards sold to the loser upon his executing to the winner the note for the price which he agreed to pay on the repurchase. Bell v. Parker, 28 D. 55.

A delivery of the property to the winner, in discharge of the gaming contract, changes the right in the property as between the parties; and the repurchase thereof by the loser does not renew the gaming contract so as to make the price agreed to be paid, the thing actually lost, nor so as to make the agreement to repay void as being founded on a gaming consideration. Ib.

Gaming transactions are viewed with stronger condemnation by the courts of South Carolina than by the English courts. Bledsoe v. Thompson, 57 D. 777.

Gaming is prohibited by statute in California. The consideration for a debt contracted thereat is illegal as between the parties, and as to all persons except bona fide holders without notice. A check given in payment of such debt is void. Fuller v. Hutchings, 70 D. 746.

The collection of money won at "ten-pins" will not be enforced by the courts. Monroe v. Smelly, 78 D. 541.

The common-law rule that an action will lie on a wager, though parties have no previous interest in the subject of the wager, is subject to the qualifications that no action will lie on a wager contrary to public policy, or immoral, or in any respect tending to public detriment, or if it affects the interests, feelings, or character of third person. Ib.

Evidence that a wager was public talk and influenced subscription to railroad stock is not admissible in an action on a wager that a railroad will be completed within a certain time. Beadles v. Bless, 81 D. 231.

One who trains a horse for a race, on which money is bet, cannot recover for his services, whether the race is run or not, as such services are in aid of a gaming transaction, which a horse-race is, and which is in violation of law. Mosher v. Griffin, 99 D. 541.

A horse-trainer may recover money laid out and expended for feed and shoes for a horse which he is fitting for a race, on which money is bet; for whether the race is run or not, it is necessary that the animal should be fed and shod, and such items are not necessarily a part of the gaming transaction. Ib.

Chancery has jurisdiction to restrain the enforcement of an unexecuted and illegal wager contract, but it must be clearly alleged and proved that the stakes are not paid over. Petillon v. Hipple, 32 R. 31.

C. sold and delivered to H. a horse upon his written agreement to pay $140 one day after the re-election of G. as President of the United States, but conditioned to be void if G. was not re-elected. Before election, H. tendered the horse to C., and demanded back his agreement, but C. refused to receive the horse or deliver up the agreement, and H. retained the horse as bailee. G. being re-elected, C. demanded the price, and H. refusing, but being ready and willing to return the horse, C. sued for the value, under a statute prohibiting wagers and permitting such action to be brought by the loser. Hebl, that the transaction was a wager, and void; that H. was at liberty to rescind by surrendering the horse; and that he was not liable under the statute unless he had subsequently converted the horse. Harper v. Crain, 38 R. 589.

I. GENERAL PRINCIPLES.
II. THE LATE CIVIL WAR

I. GENERAL PRINCIPLES

1. What amounts to war.*—A state of peace and the continuance of treaties is presumed by all courts of justice until the contrary is shown. People v. McLeod, 37 D. 328.

Private hostilities, however just or general, do not constitute a legitimate and public state of war. Ib.

War may be public, private, or mixed. Private war is unknown in civil society, except so far as it may be exerted by way of defense between private persons. To public war, at least two nations are essential parties. Mixed war can be carried on only between a nation on one side and private individuals on the other. Ib.

The right of a nation or any of its citizens to invade another nation and harm its property or citizens does not exist until public war is lawfully denounced. Ib.

Public war is of two kinds: 1. By public declaration; 2. By war denounced without such declaration. The first is called solemn or perfect war, and extends to all the inhabitants of both nations. The second is styled unsolemn or imperfect war, because made by special declaration, and limited to particular objects, beyond which it does not authorize measures of hostility. Ib.

The employment of soldiers to aid in executing process or in punishing or arresting individuals does not constitute a state of public war. Ib.

War is simply an exercise of force by bodies politic against each other for the pur-

* Levying war against United States, what is see note. 24 D. 579-581.

every species of private contract made with subjects of the enemy during war is unlawful. Billgerry v. Branch, 100 D. 679.

Contracts entered into between belligerent enemies are absolutely null. Hennen v. Gilman, 96 D. 396. No valid contract can exist, nor any promise arise by implication of law, from any transaction with an enemy during hostilities, and if, after the war has ceased, an action is brought against a citizen upon any contract arising out of such illicit intercourse, the defendant may set up the illegality of the transaction as a defense. Dorsey v. Kyle, 96 D. 617.

11. — upon rights of property. — War does not of itself suspend at once and everywhere constitutional guaranties of liberty and property. Johnson v. Jones, 92 D. 159.

12. — upon commercial intercourse. — During the existence of war between independent nations, all communication, correspondence, and intercourse between the citizens of the belligerent powers, except such as may be warlike in its character, or licensed by the sovereign power, must absolutely terminate; and all contracts and agreements between citizens of one of the belligerent powers with those of the other, unless brought within the above exception, are illegal and void. Mims v. Armstrong, 97 D. 472.

Intercourse which is prohibited by the law of nations between citizens of two belligerents during a state of war includes any act of voluntary submission to the enemy, or receiving his protection, as well as any act or contract which tends to increase his resources, and every kind of trading or commercial dealing or intercourse, whether by transmission of money or goods, or orders for the delivery of either between the two countries, directly or indirectly, or through the intervention of third persons or partnerships, or by contracts in any form looking to or involving such transmission, or by insurances upon trade with or by the enemy. Kershaw v. Kelsey, 97 D. 124.

Cases defining what intercourse between belligerents is prohibited by the law of nations cited and discussed at length. Ib.

13. — upon bills of exchange. — A check or bill of exchange drawn by a citizen of one belligerent upon a citizen of the other during war is unlawful and void. Billgerry v. Branch, 100 D. 679.

14. Suits by and against alien enemies.* — Enemies in war have no right to enter and use the courts of the adverse party; but it is competent for the legislature to permit them to do so, on such terms as it may prescribe. Peerce v. Carskadon, 6 R. 281.

* Alien enemies, who are, see note, 88 D. 779, 780.

Contracts with alien enemies, and right to sue thereon in our courts, see note, 96 D. 624-632.

As a general rule, an alien enemy is not allowed to sue in the courts of the country with which he is at the time in hostility. This, however, is a personal disability, of temporary duration, and is founded upon reason and policy, and to some extent upon the necessity of the case. Dorsey v. Kyle, 96 D. 617.

An alien enemy may be sued at law, though he may not sue, as neither reason nor policy forbids judicial proceedings against an alien enemy in favor of a friendly citizen. Ib.

The plea of an alien enemy goes only to the disability of plaintiff. It is not a matter of privilege, but a disability that suspends the right to maintain an action in the courts of the country to which the party is an enemy. There is no such thing as a plea by the defendant of his own alien enmity to the government in whose courts he is sued. Ib.

Where a debtor has left the state and become an alien enemy, his being such does not make him the less a non-resident debtor, and his position as an alien enemy does not suspend the right of his creditors to proceed by attachment or otherwise against property which he left in the state. All the remedies provided by law against the property of an absent or non-resident debtor remain open to them, and if those remedies are pursued in the mode prescribed by law, they will bind such debtor, though he be an alien enemy. Ib.

II. THE LATE CIVIL WAR.

15. What constitutes a state of civil war. — The late rebellion was a civil war. Hedges v. Price, 94 D. 507.

When a party in a rebellion occupy and hold a certain portion of territory in a hostile manner, have declared their independence, have cast off their allegiance, have organized armies, and have commenced hostilities against their former sovereign, the world acknowledges them as belligerents, and the contest a war. Lewis v. Ludwick, 98 D. 454.

16. Commencement and end of the late civil war. — Rebellion in this country had matured into civil war on the 10th of May, 1862. Bell v. Louisville etc. R. R. Co., 89 D. 632.

17. Military arrests. — Belligerent rights will not justify the citizens adhering to a belligerent power, or the common soldiery, without authority of law or the order of their military commander, in arresting and imprisoning or using violence towards citizens not arrayed in hostility to their cause. Cochran v. Tucker, 91 D. 276.

Any soldier has the right, in time of war, to arrest a belligerent engaged in acts of hostility toward the government, and lodge him in the nearest military prison, and to use such force as may be necessary for that purpose, even unto death. This is the law of war. Johnson v. Jones, 92 D. 159.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

The commanding officer may arrest a person, whether a citizen or alien, under authority of martial law, whom he finds within his lines giving aid or information to the enemy, and detain him so long as may be necessary for the security or success of his army. Ib.

A belligerent is the subject of a hostile power, and his character in that regard depends upon that of the community to which he belongs. Ib.

The people of the Confederate States were recognized as belligerents during the civil war, but citizens and residents of the Northern states, not engaged in war, were not belligerents, and subject to arrest by the federal authorities as prisoners of war, although they were domestic plotters against the government of the United States, in full sympathy with the confederates, and rendering them moral co-operation and aid. Ib.

A defendant in an action for trespass for an illegal arrest may prove in mitigation of vindictive or exemplary damages, and for the purpose of rebutting the presumption of malice, that the arrest was made by virtue of an order of the President of the United States, in time of war, for alleged disloyal practices of the plaintiff, although a special plea setting up such order is not a bar to the action. Ib.

18. Martial law.* — Military law consists of rules prescribed by Congress for the government and discipline of troops, and applies only to persons in the military or naval service of the government. Johnson v. Jones, 92 D. 159.

Martial law is not law in any proper sense, but merely the will of the military commander, to be exercised by him only on his responsibility to his government or superior officer; and when once established, it applies alike to citizen and soldier. Ib.

Martial law must be permitted to prevail on the actual theater of military operations in time of war as an unavoidable necessity, resulting from the very nature of war. Ib.

The government may be justified in treating a district as virtually attached to the theater of military operations, and in enforcing martial law therein, so far as may be necessary to the public safety, if in a district remote from the theater of military operations the popular sentiment is so disloyal to the government that one who aids and abets the public enemy cannot be rendered powerless for mischief and brought to justice by the arm of the civil law. Ib.

The exercise of martial law can be defended upon no ground beyond its enforcement on the actual field of military operations, which is the result of an overmastering necessity, and its establishment in districts which, though remote from the seat of war, are yet so far in sympathy with the public enemy as to obstruct the administration of the laws through civil tribunals, and render a resort to military power a necessity, as the only means of restraining disloyalty from overt acts, and preserving the authority of the government. Ib.

Martial law cannot be resorted to in that part of a country where the civil courts, in the midst of loyal communities, are exercising their ordinary jurisdiction, although the government may be prosecuting a war for the suppression of a rebellion in other parts of the country; and if a person is arrested in such a loyal community, and deprived of his liberty by order of the President of the United States as commander-in-chief, and as incident to a state of war, without legal process, for alleged disloyal practices therein, such arrest will be unlawful, and the parties making it will be liable to an action therefor. Ib.

Congress has no power through a retrospective law to deny all redress to a person whose property or liberty was illegally taken under a military order. Ib.

19. Rights of the belligerents. — In a war between independent sovereignties, abuse of belligerent power by soldiers in the service of their nation cannot be inquired into by the judiciary of the other, but this rule does not apply to a domestic war between the people of the same nation. Christian County Court v. Rankin, 87 D. 505.

The Kentucky statute, act of 1864, providing a "civil remedy for injuries done by disloyal persons" does not, so far as it applies to soldiers, intentionally or constitutionally extend to belligerent rights, but embraces only trespasses and spoliations committed by them in their own individual right and for their own benefit. Christian County Court v. Rankin, 87 D. 505; Bell v. Louisville etc. R. R. Co., 89 D. 632.

The destruction of the cars of a railroad by confederate forces is a lawful exercise of belligerent right when it was necessary to prevent the transportation of federal troops and cut off their supplies. Bell v. Louisville etc. R. R. Co., 89 D. 632.

The rights of belligerents, as recognized by international law between two independent sovereign powers, do not apply to a civil war between the states. Therefore, the arrest and seizure of the person and property of a private citizen, not in arms, but engaged in his ordinary occupation, by confederate soldiers under orders from their superior officer, are unlawful, and render all persons trespassers who were present, seizing, assisting, aiding, or abetting, and they are liable for the consequences of their unlawful acts. Yost v. Stout, 94 D. 194.

Government has the sovereign right to repress a rebellion by all the machinery of its civil power, and when that fails, the belligerent right to do it by military force. Hedges v. Price, 94 D. 507.

The government, in asserting its belligerent rights in suppressing a rebellion, thereby gives rebels no rights which they did not have before, further than the government may choose to accord those rights, nor does the law of nations confer any rights upon the rebels which the established government refuses to concede. Ib.

The rules, rights, and immunities of international wars do not appertain in civil wars, except so far as reason and necessity require, and the two conditions harmonize. Ib.

The rules, rights, and immunities of international wars do not appertain in civil wars to the extent of relieving individuals engaged therein from personal responsibility for acts committed by them under the authority of the rebel government. Ib.

The war of rebellion in the United States, commencing in 1861, was a civil war, producing all the consequences inter partes of an international or public war, and the appellant in this case, who allied himself with the Southern cause, and joined the confederate army, and occupied towards the citizens of Maryland an enemy's status, was held to be an alien enemy. Dorsey v. Dorsey, 96 D. 633.

Belligerents and belligerent rights are properly applicable only to sovereign powers engaged in war. In all other cases they apply sub modo, and in a limited and qualified sense. In cases of rebellion, where one party strives to obtain independence, and the other to reduce the insurgents to obedience, no such recognition occurs. Yet in the latter case a concession to the extent of humane treatment and exchange of prisoners is recognized as a belligerent right in favor of the insurgents. Smith v. Stewart, 99 D. 709.

In an action of trespass for inducing confederate soldiers to cut and take plaintiff's timber, etc., it appeared that the plaintiff and defendant owned adjoining farms; that during the war the surrounding country was at times occupied by the confederate army, which, on one occasion, cut a large amount of valuable timber from plaintiff's farm, and took and used other of his property at the suggestion and by the advice, as was alleged, of the defendant, who sympathized with the confederate cause. Held, that the cutting of the timber and taking of the property being by virtue of belligerent rights, the plaintiff could not recover. Held, further, that the belligerent rights of both parties to the war were the same and equal in extent. Smith v. Brazelton, 2 R. 678.

A citizen assisting confederate soldiers in the capture of a federal soldier does not thereby render himself liable to a civil action by the captive. Wright v. Winningham, 5 R. 35.

20. Recognition of insurgents. — The admission by us of the existence of a civil war between two foreign powers entitles both to the sovereign rights of war, and to claim from us the obligations of neutrality, although we have not acknowledged the independence of one of the powers. Walley v. Schooner Liberty, 32 D. 114.

The federal government was the sovereign, and the only sovereign, in the civil war, for recognizing and regulating belligerent rights, and on that subject no single state had any sovereignty. Price v. Poynter, 89 D. 631.

The federal government did not recognize the confederate forces as belligerents de jure, but practically as belligerents de facto, and as such reserved the power to impose such terms and conditions upon them, on the suppression of the rebellion, as the future peace and security of the country demanded. Yost v. Stout, 94 D. 194.

After the commencement of hostilities in the civil war between the confederate forces and those of the federal government, the latter granted to the rebellious forces belligerent rights to exchange prisoners, make cartels, and pass flags of truce; but at no time during the rebellion did the federal government recognize the existence of the confederate government, nor grant it the authority or right to arrest or take the persons or property of private citizens. Ib.

The government of the United States never acknowledged or recognized the Confederate States as a political power, or as having any right or authority to command the obedience of any one. Hedges v. Price, 94 D. 507.

The government of the United States conceded belligerent rights to the Confederate States only to the extent of treatment and exchange of prisoners, and not to the extent of relieving individuals from personal responsibility for acts committed by them under the authority of the confederate government. Ib.

The government of the United States never acknowledged insurgents as a government de facto, or in any sense a political power. Hawver v. Seldenridge, 94 D. 532.

The recognition of the government of a revolted state or province by a neutral power is casus belli for the power claiming dominion over the revolted country, if such recognition precedes the exhibition by the newly formed government of its ability to maintain its independence. Smith v. Stewart, 99 D. 709.

The blockade of the Southern ports and the exchange of prisoners during civil war, by the United States government, though the exercise of a belligerent right, cannot be construed into a recognition by the federal government of the Confederate States as a belligerent power or de facto government. Ib.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

21. Powers of military officers. — A military officer's right to seize and destroy or appropriate private property never exists except in case of urgent necessity for the public service, or to prevent it from falling into the hands of the public enemy. Farmer v. Lewis, 89 D. 610; Yost v. Stout, 94 D. 194.

The order of a military commander during the late civil war requiring a bank to pay to him certain moneys was equivalent to a garnishment of such moneys. Mandeville v. Bank of Louisiana, 92 D. 541.

The payment made by a bank of moneys due one of its depositors, to a military commander, pursuant to his order, operates as a discharge of such bank, and such depositor cannot recover his deposit from the bank. The bank had no right to question the legality or propriety of the order, and no power to resist its enforcement. Ib.

War existed in Tennessee after the proclamation of the President and the act of Congress in 1861 recognizing the existence of war, and declaring Tennessee to be one of the states in insurrection and rebellion, and the military authorities of the United States were properly holding a post in that state; and an officer of the United States service in command of the post had the right to exercise all the discretionary powers of a commander, coming within the scope of his military duty, for the proper exercise of which discretion he was responsible alone to his superiors in command. Sutton v. Tiller, 98 D. 471.

A commander of a detached post, during the existence of the war, has for the time and within the limits of his command the same powers and discretion as the commander of a department; and if, in the discharge of what he regarded as his duties as commander, he saw proper to take a pistol from a person, and turn it over to the government, either upon the ground that it was government arms, or because in his opinion the safety of his command or post required him to disarm the person, then he would not be liable in damages for the act before the courts of the country. The act is to be taken, not as the act of the individual, but as the act of the government, whose sovereignty he represents. Ib.

A military commander would be liable in damages if he made use of his military position as a mere pretext to enable him to extort private property for his own use, or was prompted by a spirit of wantonness and oppression. Ib.

Whatever the President of the United States as commander-in-chief might do, if personally present, may be done by the superior officer in command of any district, unless restrained by orders, or by the peculiar nature of the service in which he is engaged. Heffernan v. Porter, 98 D. 459.

An action for false imprisonment will lie against a confederate officer, who imprisons a citizen while acting in his military capacity; and in such an action the plea of belligerent rights is no defense, nor is the officer's liability affected by a pardon granted to him, by the President of the United States, for offenses arising by reason of participation in the rebellion. Caperton v. Martin, 6 R. 270.

A sheriff paid the surplus of a sale on execution to another than the person entitled thereto, by order of the military authorities in Missouri. In an action on the sheriff's bond to recover the amount, — held, that the section of the state constitution providing that no person should be prosecuted for any act done in pursuance of military authority was void in such a case, as impairing the obligation of contracts. State v. Gatzweiler, 8 R. 119.

The statute of limitations as enacted by Congress (12 Stats. at Large, 757), limiting actions for wrongs done, etc., under military authority, to two years, is applicable alike to cases in the federal and state courts. Ib.

22. Validity of captures. — The distinction between privateering and piracy is the distinction between captures jure belli under color of governmental authority, and for the benefit of a political power organized as a government de jure or de facto, and mere robbery on the high seas committed from motives of personal gain, like theft or robbery on land. In the one instance the acts committed inure to the benefit of the commissioning power; in the other, to the benefit of the perpetrators merely. Fifield v. Pennsylvania State Ins. Co., 86 D. 523.

Capture by a privateer in commission under the so-called government of Confederate States was held not to be piracy, for the reason that the President of the United States recognized such government, and the vessel as a privateer thereof, by exchanging the crew of such vessel, which had been subsequently captured, as prisoners of war. Ib.

The capture of a town is not an unlawful act in a military sense, but is allowable by the laws of war between antagonistic parties recognized as belligerents. Witherspoon v. Farmers' Bank, 87 D. 503.

The plea of a belligerent right will not justify the capture or destruction of such public property as court-houses, churches, and property of literary institutions, unless used for some military purpose by the captor's enemy. Christian County Court v. Rankin, 87 D. 505.

The confederate forces became the owners of the property captured by them from the United States, and the government, being thus lawfully deprived of title, could only acquire it again by recapture from the enemy, or by repurchase. Cesena v. Thurman, 89 D. 628.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

The laws of civilized warfare entitle each party in a civil war to same right of capture or destruction of the enemy's property; and when either the capture or destruction of property by one of such belligerents is lawful, it is equally lawful by the other; and if unlawful by one, it is equally so by the other. Bell v. Louisville and Nashville R. R. Co., 89 D. 632.

23. Seizures. — One who resided within the lines of the confederate army during the late war might be considered prima facie as an enemy of the United States, and his property as enemy's property, and liable to seizure as such. Where the federal lines were extended over his place of residence for a limited time, and the occupation of the latter army was precarious, this does not change his status. But where the occupancy of the federal troops is permanent, a resident within their lines is entitled to the protection of the law, and his property is not subject to seizure, except for such causes as the law of necessity in time of war justifies. Taylor v. Jenkins, 88 D. 773.

The private property of a loyal citizen is not subject to seizure and appropriation, even for public use, nor to prevent its falling into the hands of the enemy, unless there existed an absolute necessity for doing so; and when an order is given to take the property, the discretionary power given the officer must be sustained by the facts then existing. Ib.

An unauthorized seizure of a citizen's property by the military forces, and placing it with other property of the army without marking it or otherwise appropriating it, does not divest the owner's title. Ib.

24. Blockade. — A violation of a blockade is not deemed a personal offense by the law of nations. It only affects the vessel and cargo; and unless they are captured in delicto, the offense is purged. Smyanski v. Plassan, 96 D. 382.

25. Confiscation. — Private property on land, in times of war, is exempt from confiscation, even in case of absolute conquest of the enemy's country. But exception is made in cases of property taken from enemies in the field, or in besieged towns, by levies of military contribution, where the property is contraband of war, or is necessary for military supplies or purposes. Hawkins v. Nelson, 91 D. 492.

The act of 1862 of Congress does not ipso facto work a forfeiture of property subject to confiscation, or of itself prohibit those engaged in rebellion, or giving aid or comfort thereto, from continuing the title therein; but the forfeiture results from a judgment of a court in proceedings in which the United States is a party, and the proceeds of sale go to the government of the United States. Galbraith v. McFarland, 91 D. 281.

The conveyance of land by one engaged in rebellion against the United States is valid as against all persons except the United States, under the act of 1862 of Congress, and liable only to be contested by the government under a regular proceeding to confiscate the land conveyed. Ib.

The confederate government and its officers are estopped from calling peaceable citizens of Kentucky enemies, or treating their property as that of enemies, by the fact that that government claimed political sovereignty over the state, provided a government for her, and gave her full representation in its Congress. Terrill v. Rankin, 92 D. 500.

The federal act of 1862 authorizing the taking of all sorts of property in the revolting states might have authorized a retaliatory enactment by the confederate government. But in the absence of such enactment, the officers of the confederate government were not authorized to order the taking by force of private property of non-combatant citizens, in violation of the laws of war. Ib.

Land was seized, confiscated, and sold under the act of Congress of July, 17, 1862, providing for the seizure and confiscation of "the property of rebels." Held, that only the life estate was seized and sold, and that a state statute limiting the right of action in such cases would not bar the right of the reversioner to recover possession of such land after the termination of the life estate. Dewey v. McLain, 12 R. 418.

An executor during the war received money bequeathed to legatees residing in Indiana, which was afterward confiscated by the confederate government. Held, that the confederate government had authority as an exercise of belligerent rights to confiscate the property as of an alien enemy, and that act released the executor from his responsibility therefor. Newton v. Bushong, 12 R. 553.

One for a valuable consideration orally agreed with another to assign to him a portion of a deposit in a bank, and at the same time drew and delivered to him his check therefor. This was before the passage of the federal confiscation act. The payee duly presented the check and demanded payment, at the same time informing the bank of the assignment. The bank promised to pay the check on its identification of the payee. The check being presented the next day, payment was refused on the ground that the entire deposit had meantime been seized by the United States government under the confiscation act. In an action against the bank on the check,—held, 1. That the assignment could be proved by parol; 2. That the seizure was invalid as to the plaintiff; 3. That the confiscation act does not authorize the seizure of corporate property; 4. That an adjudication of forfeiture by the district court was without jurisdiction.

and invalid. Risley v. Phoenix Bank, 38 R. 421.

26. Claims for horses lost in the service. — The taking of horses by the confederate forces from a private citizen is excusable, as a lawful exercise of a belligerent right, if they were taken for the public use of the army, under military authority, express or implied, however wrongful in fact. Price v. Poynter, 89 D. 631.

The brand "U. S.," on a horse, without brand "L. C.," denoting that it has been inspected and condemned to be sold, is prima facie evidence that the horse once belonged to the United States, and requires rebutting evidence to show that it has since passed to some other owner. Cessna v. Thurman, 89 D. 628.

Possession by the confederate forces of a horse branded "U. S." raises a presumption that it had been captured by them, which is strengthened, instead of weakened, by the absence of the brand "L. C.," denoting that the horse had been inspected and condemned to be sold by the United States. Ib.

Where a horse, the property of defendant, a non-combatant during late war, was taken by a military force into an adjoining county, branded, and abandoned upon plaintiff's premises, who claimed and used him as his own until defendant afterwards, unknown to plaintiff, recovered possession of him, — in order to recover him plaintiff must show that at the time of his capture he belonged to that class of property liable to seizure by the general laws of war, or of the United States, or the orders of the war department. Hawkins v. Nelson, 91 D. 492.

27. Validity of statutes passed by insurgent states. — The existence of the state of Alabama as a member of the federal union was not destroyed by the passage of the ordinance of secession. Watson v. Stone, 91 D. 484.

The government of the state of Alabama during the war and while under the control of the confederacy was de facto. There was an exercise of every function of government, and it was actual in the complete exercise of all its powers. Ib.

The legislative acts of the state of Alabama while that state was a member of the confederacy were binding upon its citizens, and will protect those who acted in conformity to them; and such acts will be enforced by the United States after the restoration of its authority, although they were repugnant to the policy of its laws. Ib.

The legislative acts of a de facto government are valid, so far as they are executed or have had operation, even though its wrongful existence be afterwards decided or ascertained. All executed acts of a de facto government stand on as firm a basis as if done by a de jure government. Ib.

The Mississippi statute prohibiting the prosecution of actions or suits for debt against southern soldiers who have been called into active service by the state authorities, while such soldiers are or may be engaged in the military service of any of the southern states, is constitutional. State v. McGinty, 93 D. 264.

The ordinance of the Mississippi convention of 1861 to raise means for defense of the state, and the tax levied in consequence thereof, were rendered void by the ordinance of the convention of 1865, which declared the fundamental act of the convention of 1861 to be null and void, and the state can assert no rights founded on and proceeding from those acts. Ib.

The act of the rebel legislature of Alabama is invalid, because such legislature constituted one of the departments of a state government established in hostility to the constitution of the United States, and cannot be regarded, therefore, in the courts of the United States as a lawful legislature, or its acts as lawful acts. Ray v. Thompson, 94 D. 696.

The act of the rebel legislature of Alabama, the tendency or purpose of which is to force the circulation of confederate currency, is illegal, unconstitutional, and wholly without force as a law, as it aided the prosecution of the war of rebellion against the United States government. Ib.

The act of December 9, 1862, authorizing guardians, etc., to make loans to the Confederate States, and to purchase and receive in payment of debts confederate currency, is wholly void as being in aid of rebellion against the United States, and money so loaned or received by them will not be credited to them upon a settlement of their accounts. Hall v. Hall, 94 D. 703.

Many acts of a legislature are not compulsory commands, except to the courts which are charged with their enforcement. They are only enabling acts; mere permissions under whose authority a person may act or refrain from acting. If he voluntarily acts under them, and they turn out to be unconstitutional or invalid, they afford no protection for his acts. Ib.

The exception in the Texas stay laws, as to demands against "alien enemies" and "persons who abandon the country," were intended to apply to citizens of the loyal states in the Union, and to citizens of Texas who were compelled to abandon their homes on account of their fidelity to the national government, and showed such laws to be in aid of the rebellion, and therefore null and void. Sequestration Cases, 98 D. 494.

State governments did not cease to exist during civil war, in the states engaged in the rebellion, and their legislation in the exercise of such powers as appertained to them under the United States constitution was valid; but all acts of such governments as were in hostility to the United States, or in disregard or in conflict with its constitution, or intended directly or indirectly to aid the rebellion, were absolute nullities, and they cannot be invoked in support of any rights or for the protection of any persons acting under them. Ib.

An inferior court was established by an act of the legislature of an insurgent state during the rebellion; after the suppression of the rebellion a judge was elected for six years, and his election was ratified by the legislature. The legislature afterward, and before the expiration of the six years, abolished the court. Held, that the act was never a valid law; that the legislature had the constitutional right to abolish the court; and that thereafter the judge had no claim to the salary. Perkins v. Corbin, 6 R. 698.

28. Provisional or temporary governments.—The order of the military governor of Louisiana, made while the city of New Orleans was under the dominion and control of the federal military authorities, and requiring the judges of other courts of the parish of Orleans to hold the sessions of the fourth and fifth district courts, and to terminate pending cases, gave such judges full authority to exercise in those courts the functions of the judges thereof. Lanfear v. Mestier, 89 D. 658.

The United States could not make a conquest of its own territory during the civil war, nor by the triumph of arms gain any higher rights over the soil and inhabitants of the revolted district than it enjoyed before the war. The general laws, proprio vigore, would extend over the revolted territory, when the rebellion was suppressed and the inhabitants coerced into obedience. Rutledge v. Fogg, 91 D. 299.

A revolted territory actually occupied by a military power of the United States was subject to the laws of belligerent occupation, pending the civil war; and its authority being ex necessitate, paramount, it might suspend the municipal laws of the territory, or permit them to remain in force. Ib.

The temporary government and laws for a territory seized and occupied by the United States in time of war may be established by the President, in the exercise of his constitutional power as commander-in-chief of the army and navy, and by the military officers under his authority. Ib.

A temporary government established by military authority of the United States in time of war, over territory seized and occupied, had power to levy and collect taxes pending the military occupation. Ib.

Taxes assessed, flagrante bello, for municipal purposes by municipal authorities, who held their offices by virtue of the military power of the United States over territory seized and occupied, may be collected after the belligerent occupation has ceased. Ib.

The "provisional government of Kentucky," attempted to be established during the civil war, was never in any sense a de facto government, never having been recognized by the political department of the United States nor of the state of Kentucky as such; and where the political departments refuse or fail to recognize a government de facto, the judiciary never does. Simpson v. Lovering, 96 D. 252.

The commander of the military forces of the United States had power, during the civil war, to establish, in any district in the insurrectionary states held in firm possession by force of arms, and during such belligerent occupation, such temporary government as he might deem proper, and to appoint and control the necessary officers and agents, and to prescribe the modes in which such governments should be administered. Hefserman v. Porter, 98 D. 459.

The right to establish a government is not dependent upon the right of conquest, but is incident to the mere right of belligerent occupation. A nation cannot conquer its own territory, but it may subdue and occupy such portions of it as are in insurrection; and the right to govern for the time being is necessarily embraced in the right of subjugation and occupation. Ib.

The right of a military occupant to govern implies the right to determine in what manner and through what agencies such government is to be conducted. The municipal laws of the place may be left in operation, or they may be suspended, and other laws put in force. The administration of justice may be left in the hands of the ordinary officers of the law, or these may be suspended and others appointed in their place. Civil rights and civil remedies may be suspended, and military laws and military courts and proceedings may be substituted for them; or new tribunals may be established, and new legal remedies and civil proceedings may be introduced. Ib.

A conqueror exercises for the time being powers of a de facto government; and the jurisdiction and authority possessed and exercised by the tribunals created by him must depend upon his discretion; and in this respect the act of every military commander is the act of the commander-in-chief until disapproved or annulled, and is of necessity to be obeyed as such. Ib.

29. Effect of the war on commercial intercourse.—War will operate to render void commercial contracts entered into during its pendency, between citizens of one of the belligerents with those of the other belligerent; will suspend the civil remedy upon existing contracts between similar parties, and will dissolve pre-existing contracts of continuing performance, such as those of partnership and insurance. Leathers v. Commercial Ins. Co., 92 D. 483.

The rules concerning the effect of war upon contracts between belligerents will apply as well to a civil war as to an international war, when the former has been authoritatively recognized by the domestic government, for in such case it becomes, as to its legal incidents and consequences, quasi international. But until so recognized, it is a mere insurrection, and will not affect commercial intercourse and transactions. Ib.

Contracts and other acts of commercial intercourse between belligerents were not made illegal by the civil war in the United States until after the proclamation of the President of August 16, 1861, issued under authority of the act of Congress of July 13, 1861, providing that the President might issue a proclamation interdicting all commercial intercourse between the citizens of the then and thereby recognized belligerent states. Ib.

Every person within the military lines of the United States during the late civil war was belligerent with reference to person residing within the confederate lines, and a contract entered into between such belligerents was absolutely null and void. Hennen v. Gilman, 96 D. 396.

The acts of Congress and the proclamations of the president prohibiting commercial intercourse during the civil war, with insurrectionary states did not affect agreements made in those states between persons being there, whatever might be their citizenship, for the leasing of real estate therein, the payment of rent there out of the products of the land, or the delivery of and payment for personal property already upon the demised premises, to be used thereon. Kershaw v. Kelsey, 97 D. 124; 1 R. 142.

The subsequent unlawful forwarding of cotton raised on the land by the defendant's son does not affect the validity of the agreements contained in the lease. Kershaw v. Kelsey, 1 R. 142.

All contracts entered into between citizens of the United States and citizens of the Confederate States during the late civil war were illegal and void, unless licensed or permitted by the President of the United States, not only because all intercourse between citizens of the different belligerents was forbidden by the act of Congress of the United States of July 13, 1861, and the proclamation of the President in pursuance thereof, but also because the principle of international law forbidding all intercourse between the citizens of independent nations during the existence of war was applicable to the war between the United States and the Confederate States. Mims v. Armstrong, 97 D. 472.

The demand of payment of a check made by a resident of Vicksburg upon a bank in New Orleans while commercial intercourse between Vicksburg and New Orleans was prohibited by proclamation of the President, was illegal. Billgerry v. Branch, 100 D. 679.

The late rebellion was war, and citizens on opposite sides were alien enemies, and their relations, under the constitution, were suspended and superseded for the time by new relations under the laws of war. Ib.

International law applied to contracts and transactions between residents within the limits of the confederacy and residents in territory under federal authority. Ib.

A contract was made, the consideration of which arose from the following transaction: H., of Kentucky, drew and delivered to C., of the same state, an order addressed to E., of Texas, requesting him to pay money in his hands to T., also of Texas. The order was transmitted through the lines, and executed. Held, that this transaction was not a violation of the proclamation of the President of the United States of August 16, 1861, prohibiting all commercial intercourse between the loyal and rebellious states, Kentucky being loyal and Texas disloyal, and that the contract supported by this transaction was valid. Haggard v. Conkright, 3 R. 297.

The relation of attorney and client between a resident of the North and a resident of the South was terminated by the late war. Blackwell v. Willard, 6 R. 749.

30. — on commercial paper. — A note given for the rent of a hospital building during the late rebellion was not void, where the circumstances were such that the furnishing of a building for hospital purposes was immediately required by the dictates of common humanity, for the diseased and wounded belligerents. Any citizen might lawfully provide it, under such circumstances, and a note given for its rent would not be an act in aid of rebellion. The existence of such circumstances was a question of fact for the jury. Fottrell v. German, 98 D. 442.

While neither a soldier nor citizen can lawfully give aid or comfort to a rebel soldier actually in arms, and while contracts giving aid and comfort to rebellion are illegal and void, the moment that such rebel soldier is hors de combat, the situation is changed, and his life may be preserved, and his sufferings relieved, though the effect is to preserve a soldier to the enemy, and thus indirectly aid the rebellion. Ib.

A check drawn and indorsed in Virginia, during the late civil war, upon a bank in New Orleans, while New Orleans was under the permanent possession and control of the federal forces, is void, and the contract of indorsement is void, though all the parties, except the New Orleans bank, were residents and citizens of the Confederate States. Billgerry v. Branch, 100 D. 679.

The defendant, in an action on a promissory note, alleged that the note was given for slaves taken by the plaintiff from Missouri to Arkansas, after the proclamation declaring that state in insurrection. Held, that the transaction was in violation of law, and that the note could not therefore be collected. Carson v. Hunter, 2 R. 529.

The defendants, at the breaking out of the rebellion of 1861, were copartners doing business at Savannah, Georgia, where one of them, named Wheaton, resided. Two of the defendants did business as copartners in New York, where they resided. On the 23d of August, 1861, the plaintiff's agent purchased of the Savannah firm a bill of exchange. It was drawn by Wheaton in the name of his firm on the New York firm of defendants. By an act of Congress passed July 13, 1861, the President was authorized to declare certain districts in insurrection, and that thereupon all commercial intercourse should cease and become unlawful. On the 16th of August, 1861, the President, by proclamation, declared the district in which Savannah is situated in a state of insurrection. Held, that the drawing of the bill of exchange was illegal and void, and within the rule prohibiting contracts with the enemy during war, and no action could lie against any of the parties to it. Woods v. Wilder, 3 R. 684.

The copartnership between Wheaton and the other defendants was dissolved by the war, and the defendants were not bound by the contract of Wheaton made after such dissolution. Ib.

Defendants were copartners, doing business both in Savannah and New York. Held, that a bill of exchange, drawn during the war by the firm in Savannah on the firm in New York, was void. Ib.

A note given since the war to the mayor and council of Savannah, for a tax assessed by the city authorities during the existence of the confederate government, but not collected, is void for want of consideration. O'Byrne v. Mayor, 5 R. 532.

A note given for such tax, and for ground-rent due the city, by contract made prior to the war, is void as to the tax, but good as to the rent. The consideration is clearly severable, as the record shows precisely how much of it was for tax, and how much for rent. Ib.

Action on a promissory note. Plea, that when the note was made, plaintiff was a citizen of Minnesota, and defendant a citizen of Arkansas, aiding the rebellion, and public enemies of the United States. Held, that the plea was good. Rice v. Shook, 11 R. 783.

Where an agent of the war department of the confederate government issued the following instrument: "Confederate States Depositary, Willmington, pay Messrs. Coolie & Co., or order, twenty thousand dollars," which was indorsed by the payees to the defendant, who indorsed it to another person, by whom it was indorsed to the plaintiff, — held, that the instrument was illegal; that such illegality was apparent upon its face, and extended to all the indorsements. Cronly v. Hall, 12 R. 597.

An agent of the confederate government drew a negotiable order on the war department, and it was indorsed to plaintiff for value. Held, illegal. Ib.

31. — on running of interest. — Interest continues to run in time of civil war on debts due from a citizen of one belligerent to a citizen of the other. Spencer v. Brower, 5 R. 254.

On the 14th of August, 1860, the plaintiff loaned the defendant, a citizen of Minnesota, the sum of seventeen thousand dollars, upon a bond and mortgage on lands in that state, conditioned for the payment of the principal in five years, with interest payable semi-annually. The plaintiff was at the time a resident of North Carolina, and so continued to the date of the action, and not there nor elsewhere engaged in the service of the United States, but during the whole period he had an agent in the state of Minnesota. In an action brought to foreclose the mortgage, — held, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the interest accruing on the bond during the rebellion and before maturity. Lash v. Lambert, 2 R. 142.

32. — on transfers of title to land. — A mortgage executed during the continuance of a civil war, by a citizen of one of the Confederate States to a citizen of one of the Union states, was illegal and void. Hyatt v. James, 92 D. 505.

A deed of lands in Iowa, executed in 1863, by a citizen of Virginia to a citizen in Ohio, is void. Hill v. Baker, 7 R. 193.

On vacating a sale of lands of a testator, made under order and decree of the so-called court of probate of the late confederate government of Alabama, if such sale has been made for confederate treasury notes of the so-called "Confederate States of America," the purchaser should be charged with the value of the use and occupation of the land during his possession, and allowed credit for the value of confederate treasury notes at the date of the purchase, if the sale was for cash, and if said notes were of benefit to the testator's estate or his heirs, and for the value of all necessary repairs and improvements by him made on said land. Mosely v. Tutill, 6 R. 710.

33. — on legal proceedings. — The right of citizens to prosecute and defend actions, and other judicial proceedings, cannot be abrogated or even suspended; this right being guaranteed both by section 8 of the

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

Minnesota bill of rights, and by section 2 of article 4 of the constitution of the United States. Davis v. Pierce, 82 D. 65.

The act suspending the privilege of prosecuting and defending actions and judicial proceedings, as to persons aiding the rebellion against the United States, is unconstitutional and void. Ib.

The act of 1861 staying civil process against any person in the service of the state or the United States for the term of such service, and thirty days thereafter, is constitutional, the stay being for a definite and not unreasonable time, considering the exigencies of the government at the time when it was passed, and the fact that the statute of limitations in favor of the soldier was by the act suspended during his exemption from process. Breitenbach v. Bush, 84 D. 442.

The act of 1861 gives but one stay, to be computed from time of original muster, and a re-enlistment would not renew it. Ib.

Levari facias sur mortgage is process within the meaning of the stay law of April 18, 1861. Ib.

The legislature may superadd a legal stay to a prior one voluntarily given by the creditor. Ib.

The Kentucky amnesty act of February 28, 1867, is unconstitutional in so far as it affects or was intended to effect civil remedies for private wrongs. Terrill v. Rankin, 92 D. 500.

War does not have the effect of preventing a citizen of a state from enforcing its laws in the courts of the state, so as to subject a non-resident enemy's real estate, situated in the state, to the payment of a debt contracted before the war began, and secured by a mortgage on the property itself, executed and recorded here, whilst the debtor himself was a resident of the state. Dorsey v. Dorsey, 96 D. 633.

War has no effect upon a purchaser's title, where defendant, absent in enemy's country, is served by publication. The law as to proceeding against a non-resident by order of publication applies to all non-residents, whether alien enemies or not. All that is required is strict compliance with the statute. Impossibility of receiving and complying with the notice makes no difference. So a notice by publication to defendant, while absent in the confederate lines, was held effectual to bind him; that a sale of mortgaged property after such notice was valid; and that neither war nor residence in the enemy's territory could be set up to avoid the proceedings, and defeat the title of the purchaser acquired thereunder. Ib.

A person who by his own voluntary act assumed the attitude of an alien enemy to the state of Maryland, and to the government of the United States, went from Maryland to Virginia during the late civil war, allied himself with the Southern cause, and joined the confederate army, cannot claim exemption from process of attachment in behalf of antecedent creditors against his property remaining in Maryland, on the ground that he was an alien enemy, and that "all legal remedies were suspended during the period of hostilities." Dorsey v. Kyle, 96 D. 617.

A compulsory payment of a debt to a receiver of the Confederate States, under process of garnishment and a decree of the district court of the Confederate States of America, is no bar to the recovery of the debt. Sequestration Cases, 98 D. 494.

Where a citizen and resident of New York had a suit pending in North Carolina previous to the late war, and during the war his debtor there paid up his indebtedness to the attorney or agent of such non-resident, — held, that such action was void, and that the relation of attorney and client was terminated by the war. Blackwell v. Willard, 6 R. 749.

Any securities held by a citizen and resident of New York previous to the late war, upon persons resident in North Carolina, could not be extinguished durante bello, either through the agency of the courts there, or through the former agents and attorneys of such non-resident. Ib.

Therefore, where a debtor to a citizen or resident of New York paid off said claim to a clerk and master in such state in confederate currency, before such currency had depreciated to any extent, such payment is a nullity. Ib.

The service of a summons issued from a confederate court during the rebellion is not binding upon the party to appear, and a judgment entered thereon is void. Thompson v. Mankin, 7 R. 628.

An action was commenced before the war, in Arkansas, against a citizen of Ohio, who appeared by a duly authorized attorney and filed his plea. After the state had seceded, the action was tried, the same attorney defending, and judgment was rendered for the plaintiff. In an action in Ohio on the judgment, — held, that the Arkansas court was without jurisdiction, and that the attorney could not confer jurisdiction by consent. Pennycott v. Foote, 22 R. 340.

34. — to suspend running of statute of limitations. — The statute of limitations was suspended in Alabama during the period in which the courts were virtually closed by the war. Coleman v. Holmes, 4 R. 121.

35. Status of the Confederate States. — The status of the Confederate States, so called, as a government, discussed, but not decided. Fifield v. Pennsylvania Ins. Co., 88 D. 523.

An ordinance of secession, by which it was sought to withdraw the state of Alabama from the Union was an absolute nullity; the rightful state of Alabama, the constitutionally constituted member of the Union, was never out of the Union, though its government was suspended by the war. Hall v. Hall, 94 D. 703.

The rebel state government of Alabama was unconstitutional and wholly void; the general assembly of this illegal government and its laws partook of its nature, and were equally invalid, illegal, and void. Ib.

In no proper legal sense can either the government of the so-called Confederate States, or of the state of Alabama, during the rebellion, be called a government de facto. They were rebel governments, and nothing more; they never obtained possession of the rightful government of the state by which it became a member of the Union; they never struggled to get possession of such rightful government, but rather to set up and establish a new, separate, distinct, and hostile government, having nothing in common with the legal government. Chisholm v. Coleman, 94 D. 678.

The governments of the several rebellious states constituted parts of and constituted the Confederate States government, and partook of its nature and character. As such latter government never in any sense became a government de facto, neither did the governments of any of the several rebel states. Ib.

A government de facto, in a proper legal sense, is a government that unlawfully gets possession and control of the rightful legal government, and maintains itself there, by force and arms, against the will of the rightful legal government, and claims to exercise the powers thereof. Ib.

The Confederate States of America, and the state governments organized under it, in relation to the United States and its loyal citizens, were not governments de jure or de facto as those terms are used in the law of nations. Cusell v. Backrack, 97 D. 436; 2 R. 590.

The confederate government was one de facto as to its own citizens. In reference to all matters of internal, private, and domestic import, not affected by the laws and constitution of the United States, and which were completed and consummated, — in other words, executed, — the confederate government and the state governments under it were governments in fact for the time being for the purpose of protecting the rights of persons and property, and as an immunity to its citizens from liability and punishment for obeying the laws of such government. Ib.

The courts will leave parties in pari delicto exactly as it finds them. Thus where parties who were residents within and adherents to the confederate government during the late civil war had a controversy as to their legal rights as existing under that government, the courts of the legitimate government, when restored, denied their active aid to either party, and left them exactly as they found them. Ib.

The fact that the Confederate States were a belligerent power did not constitute them a government de facto, nor did they attain that status because they established a government of their own and exercised jurisdiction over the country which they embraced. Smith v. Stewart, 99 D. 709.

A government de facto arises only where the established government has been subverted by successful rebellion, and the new government exercises undisputed sway for the time over the whole country, or where the people of any portion of a country subject to the same government throw off their allegiance to that government and establish one of their own, and show, not only that they have established it, but their ability to maintain it. Ib.

The government of the Confederate States did not attain the status of a government de facto. The authority set up by them was illegal and void. Ib.

The plaintiff, in payment of a tax levied by the state on his cotton, in 1866, tendered to the sheriff a "cotton note," issued under an act of the confederate legislature of 1861, and made receivable in payment of all present or future taxes. The sheriff refusing to receive the note, plaintiff brought suit for an injunction to restrain the sale and compel acceptance. Held, that the Confederate States government being neither a de jure nor de facto government, its acts were not binding on a succeeding lawful government; and that the notes in question, being issued in aid of the rebellion, were void, and therefore not receivable. Thomas v. Taylor, 2 R. 625.

The courts of Louisiana having declared all contracts the consideration of which was confederate money illegal and void, the courts of Mississippi will not enforce a note given in Louisiana for a loan of such money. Ivey v. Lalland, 2 R. 606; 97 D. 475.

A promise to pay a note in confederate bonds or in Tennessee money will be enforced as to the latter, it being valid. Hanauer v. Gray, 99 D. 226.

36. Reconstruction acts. — The reconstruction laws of Congress permit the state governments to continue, and their laws, so far as constitutional, to be administered. Sequestration Cases, 98 D. 494.

1. Nature of the contract with. —

The employment of a warehouseman and forwarding merchant in the usual course of his business imports a hiring, and that he is to be paid. Graves v. Smith, 80 D. 762.

A transaction is a sale, and not a bailment, and the risk of loss by accident is upon the warehouseman, where he receives wheat, and with the depositor's consent, or by custom, mixes it with that of others, with the understanding that it is to be at the disposal of the warehouseman, and that when the depositor should present the receipts, the warehouseman would either pay the market price therefor, or redeliver the wheat, or other wheat equal in amount and quality. Chase v. Washburn, 59 D. 623.

Where grain of different owners becomes intermingled in one common mass, according to the usage of warehousemen, and without objection by the owners, it becomes common property, owned by the several parties in the proportion in which each contributed to the common stock, and the several owners are subject to sustain any loss pro rata which may occur by diminution, decay, or otherwise. Dole v. Olmstead, 85 D. 397.

When corn of different owners blended in a warehouse falls short of the amount put in, and for which warehouse receipts are given, the holders of the receipts must share the loss proportionately. Ib.

One who deposits wheat for storage, knowing that it is to be commingled with wheat owned by the warehouseman, and that the latter is selling and publicly shipping from the common mass, is estopped to assert title as against an innocent purchaser in the usual course of business. Preston v. Witherspoon, 58 R. 417.

2. Warehouse receipts.* — A warehouseman's receipt is a contract of parties as to the property stored, and parol evidence is inadmissible to change or vary its terms. Leonard v. Dunton, 99 D. 568.

A warehouseman's receipt for grain does not clothe the holder with any specific or general lien on the property of the warehouseman, although that should consist also of grain put in common bulk with that of the holder of the receipt; but such property of the warehouseman remains subject to sale and transfer, precisely as though such a receipt had not been given; and the holder of the receipt has only the obligation of the warehouseman for proper storage and delivery of his grain, according to the terms thereof, or on default has a right to recover the damages growing out of a breach of the contract. Dole v. Olmstead, 85 D. 397.

The holder of a receipt for grain in a warehouse who has become an owner in common with others by the intermingling of the grain of all in one common mass, if he has received the full quantity called for by his receipt or a larger proportion than his ratable share, would, in view of a deficiency, be bound to account for such excess received by him in proportion to the loss. Ib.

A purchaser of pork in a warehouse who takes warehouse receipts therefor, indorsed in blank by his vendor, and then, to enable the vendor to withdraw the pork from the warehouse for the purpose of overhauling and repacking it, delivers the receipts back to the vendor, who transfers them to a bona fide purchaser, still remains the owner of the pork, and may maintain replevin for it against the warehouseman, for there was no negligence on his part, or any departure from the ordinary course of business; nor is he chargeable with negligence because he did not surrender the original receipts and take out new ones in his own name before delivering them back to the vendor, since this would not have guarded third persons against the fraud of the vendor. Burton v. Curyea, 89 D. 350.

A warehouseman is estopped from denying the description of property in the receipt, so far as it relates to matters which are or ought to be within his knowledge or that of his agents; but not in respect to matters not open to ordinary inspection, and visible, and where a local custom requires that the kind of property described in the receipt must, for the purpose of purchase and sale, either have a well-known brand, or be inspected, as a condition of purchase, and that purchasers rely on the warehouse receipt only for custody, and not for quality or kind. Hale v. Milwaukee Dock Co., 99 D. 169.

3. — and rights of assignees. — The liability of a warehouseman to the assignee of the original bailor of goods will not protect such goods against the creditors of the bailor if his assignee's title has been adjudged invalid. Burton v. Wilkinson, 46 D. 145.

The Iowa code, section 949, authorizes the assignee of a warehouse receipt, by which the maker promises to deliver a certain quantity of corn, to sue in his own name, subject, however, to any defense or set-off, legal or equitable, which the maker had against the assignor, before notice of the assignment. Merchants' etc. Bank v. Hewitt, 66 D. 49.

A warehouse receipt for a certain number of bushels of corn, to be delivered to the order of the person to whom the receipt is given, at a certain place, in sacks, in good order, free of charges, risk of fire excepted, is not a negotiable instrument under the laws of Iowa. Ib.

The use of the words "to be delivered to his order," in a warehouse receipt for a quantity of corn, do not of themselves manifest any intention on the part of the maker to render it negotiable. Ib.

A warehouse receipt may be transferred without indorsement, so as to pass title to the property, if the owner makes the transfer with that intent, in a case where the receipt recites that the property therein mentioned is "deliverable to bearer." Rice v. Cutler, 84 D. 747.

A Wisconsin statute of 1860, providing that warehouse receipts may be transferred by indorsement, and what effect they shall have when so transferred, does not operate to prevent in all cases a passing of title without indorsement, the language being permissive, and not imperative, and the right existing independently of statute. The object of the statute is not to prevent the owner of property from passing the title in any manner previously effectual for that purpose, but to protect those dealing with persons who are intrusted with such evidences of title only as factors or agents. Ib.

The fact that warehouse receipts are taken in discharge of prior indebtedness will not deprive the transferee of the protection to which he would otherwise be entitled as an innocent purchaser without notice that his vendor acquired title by fraud. Ib.

Warehouse receipts are not negotiable so as to enable the person holding them to transfer a greater right or title to the property mentioned in them than he has himself. They stand in the place of the property itself; the delivery of the receipts has the same effect as the delivery of the property, no greater and no less; and a transfer of a warehouse receipt by the person in possession of it gives no higher title than would the transfer of the property by the same person. Burton v. Curyea, 89 D. 350.

In the absence of a statute provision a warehouse receipt is not negotiable, and an assignment of it conveys no better title than the assignor had. Solomon v. Bushnell, 50 R. 475. S. P., Second Nat. Bank v. Walbridge, 2 R. 408.

The indorsement and delivery of a warehouse receipt of goods stored transfers the ownership of the property only, and not the contract itself. Hale v. Milwaukee Dock Co., 9 R. 603.

In an action by the assignee, for the value of a warehouse receipt, to recover the property described therein, — held, that the obligation of the warehouseman, in the absence of fraud or neglect on his part, was discharged by delivering the property actually received in store, although it did not answer the description of the receipt. Ib.

Possession of a warehouse receipt, regularly indorsed, is presumptive evidence of ownership of the goods described therein. Davis v. Russell, 28 R. 647.

L., at the city of New York, indorsed and delivered to the plaintiff a warehouse receipt for goods on storage in Boston, by which the warehouseman agreed to deliver the goods to L. on payment of charges, but containing no agreement to deliver to his order. Held, 1. That the effect of the transfer was to be determined by the law of Massachusetts; 2. That no title passed to the plaintiff as against a creditor of L. attaching the goods before notice of the transfer was given to the warehouseman. Hallgarten v. Oldham, 46 R. 433.

The transfer of a warehouseman's receipt for goods on storage carries title, without notice to him or agreement by him to hold for the transferee. Durr v. Hervey, 51 R. 594.

Where a warehouse receipt runs to the bailor personally, and is not negotiable in form, the bailor may not effect a transfer of the title by mere delivery of the receipt without the consent of the warehouseman. Gill v. Frank, 53 R. 378.

4. Diligence or care required.— Warehouseman is liable only for ordinary care of goods intrusted to him. Schmidt v. Blood, 24 D. 143; Vincent v. Rather, 98 D. 516. And if the warehouseman, without the owner's consent, mixes the property with other property, and ships the same for sale, he will be liable to the owner for the value of the property thus deposited. Chase v. Washburn, 59 D. 623.

On September 9, 1876, the plaintiff shipped from Boston to Baltimore, by defendant's steamer, boxes of books, under a bill of lading providing that freight must be removed from the wharf, at the place of discharge, during business hours on the day of discharge, or it was liable to be stored at the risk and expense of the owner; all merchandise at the owner's risk while on the wharf. The steamer arrived at Baltimore on the 12th of September, and the goods were on that day discharged, and put on the defendant's wharf, but not on the highest part. A notice was the same day mailed to the plaintiff, stating that the goods were ready for delivery, and must be removed within twelve hours or they would be stored at the plaintiff's risk and expense. The plaintiff did not receive this notice, and he did not call for his books until the 18th. On Sunday, the 17th, an unusually violent storm of rain and southeast wind occurred, and flooded the wharf. This was the first time the part of the wharf where these goods were stored had been submerged, although in a period of twenty years another part had been flooded, the water then rising to within a few inches of the part in question. The wharf was well covered, and ordinarily was secure for storage, and watchmen were employed night and day. Signs of a violent storm and rise of water were noticed before eight o'clock of the morning in question; the water rose steadily all day until 2 P. M., and then suddenly rushed over the wharf. The watchman did all he could to remove the goods, but was unable, owing to the rise of the water and the absence of assistance, to save them. Held, that the defendant had not used due and reasonable care, and that evidence of its custom to store goods on the wharf was properly rejected. Merchants' Transp. Co. v. Story, 33 R. 293.

Defendant received in his storehouse household furniture of the plaintiff, depositing it in a room with two locks, of one of which plaintiff held the key, and assuring the plaintiff that the goods would be guarded and safe. Some of the goods were stolen by persons in charge of the building. Held, that whether the contract was of bailment or hiring, the defendant was bound to ordinary care and prudence in guarding the goods. Jones v. Morgan, 43 R. 131.

The plaintiff having recovered some of the goods by means of detectives and legal proceedings, and repaired such of it as was damaged, — held, that she might recover her expenditure therefor. Ib.

Warehousemen are responsible for due care in storing the goods intrusted to them in a place of reasonable safety, and are to be charged only upon proof of their own negligence, or that of their servants in the course of their employment. Aldrich v. Boston etc. R. R. Co., 1 R. 76.

A warehouseman having in his possession goods subject to owner's directions as to their shipment, is at liberty, in the absence of instructions, to use his discretion in shipping by the usual or best route; but if he has specific instructions, he is bound to follow them. Graves v. Smith, 80 D. 762.

Where a shipper of goods notifies a warehouseman that he has contracted with a certain railroad company to carry them to their destination, and the warehouseman replies that "it is all right," he has no right to afterwards send the goods in any other way; and if he does so, and they are lost, he will be liable therefor. Ib.

A warehouseman having in his possession goods of A, and also of B, delivered by mistake to C the goods of B, on an order from A, of whom C had purchased goods to fill an order from D. The goods were received from C by D, and appropriated to his own use by him without notice or knowledge of the mistake, and in good faith. Held, that D was not liable to the warehouseman, either in assumpsit, because there was no privity of contract, or in tort, for their conversion, because the warehouseman's own act contributed to the misappropriation. Hills v. Snell, 6 R. 216.

A warehouseman is bound to keep the approaches on his premises safe for the use of his customers. Unless he does so, he is liable for an injury, although no one may ever have been hurt before. And even if the customer knows the approach to be dangerous, it is not necessarily negligent in him to use it. Nave v. Flack, 46 R. 205.

In an action against a warehouseman for a failure to keep safely goods intrusted to him, if it appears that the damage was caused by the fall of the warehouse, the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show that such damage was caused by the negligence of the defendant. Willett v. Rich, 56 R. 684.

5. Fees for storage. — A purchaser of a warehouse receipt for grain subject to charges for storage will be personally bound for the storage, even though he has removed the grain with the consent of the warehouseman. Cole v. Tynog, 76 D. 735.

6. — and lien therefor.* — A warehouseman has a lien upon the balance left in his hands of an entire lot of merchandise intrusted to him at the same time, after a delivery of part, for the storage of the whole. Schmidt v. Blood, 24 D. 143.

The lien of a warehouseman is specific, not general; and where the ownership in the goods bailed is entirely in the bailor, or a purchaser from him, each parcel of the goods is liable for the warehouse charges, not only for its particular proportion, but for the whole thereof, provided the whole was received under one bailment. Steinman v. Wilkins, 42 D. 254.

A warehouseman with whom a common carrier stores goods may retain possession of the same, when so instructed by the carrier, until "back charges thereon are paid." Alden v. Carver, 81 D. 430.

7. Liabilities of warehousemen, generally.† — A warehouseman, who has given a receipt which entitles the holder to the goods stored upon presentation thereof, is liable to an attaching creditor of the bailor, if he surrenders the goods to a holder of such receipt, who purchased the same after the date of attachment. Smith v. Pickett, 50 D. 385.

Fraudulent representations by a warehouseman, or a previous demand upon him, must be shown, in an action against him, where he delivered a quantity of wheat on board plaintiff's vessel upon the order of the owner, representing that he had delivered a certain number of bushels, whereupon plaintiff was induced to issue his bill of lading to the owner for that quantity, and where it afterwards was discovered that there was a less quantity, and the plaintiff became liable for the deficiency. Norris v. Milwaukee Dock Co., 91 D. 464.

Where a purchaser of a warehouse and grain agrees to assume all the contracts of a vendor growing out of the business, an action will lie against him on a receipt previously given by the vendor for grain, stipulating that the grain should be delivered on demand or the money paid; but the vendor should be joined as a party defendant. Hardy v. Blazer, 92 D. 347.

A warehouseman who receives wheat on storage, giving memoranda stating that the wheat was No. 2 wheat, is not estopped from showing that the wheat delivered to him was not No. 2 wheat, nor from showing that he is entitled to discharge his contract by returning the same wheat that he received. And a purchaser to whom the owner of the wheat transferred the memoranda, and delivered written orders directing the warehouseman to deliver the wheat to the bearer, has no greater right, as against the warehouseman, than his vendor had. Robson v. Stewart, 100 D. 238.

Where servants of warehousemen are present during the destruction of the warehouse by fire in the night-time, their neglect to remove goods from the warehouse is not such negligence as will charge the warehousemen, unless it be shown that such was a part of the service for which the servants were engaged. Aldrich v. Boston etc. R. Co., 1 R. 76.

Plaintiff sent his goods, in charge of G., to defendant's warehouse, for storage. G. put his name on the goods, and left a written notice with defendant not to give them up without his consent. Plaintiff then sent a written notice to defendant, saying: "Please hold the same, subject only to my written order. The property is mine." Soon after, plaintiff demanded the goods of defendant, who refused to deliver them up, even after plaintiff had offered him a bond of indemnity, and to pay all charges. Subsequently, the sheriff levied on the goods, under two executions against G., and, on the following day, an execution against plaintiff came into the sheriff's hands. The goods were sold on one of the executions against G., and the proceeds applied in payment thereof. Held, that defendant was liable for the value of the goods on the ground that he ought to have given up the goods on demand and offer of indemnity by plaintiff, or commenced a suit by bill of interpleader to determine the respective rights of plaintiff and G.; and that, as the goods were in fact plaintiff's, the levy and sale of them under an execution against G. did not mitigate the damages, notwithstanding the fact that the sheriff also held an execution against plaintiff, under which he did nothing. Ball v. Liney, 8 R. 511.

The defendant, proprietor of a warehouse for storage, represented it in circulars to be fire-proof on the exterior. A statute required such buildings to have fire-proof metal window shutters. There were no shutters, and the window frames were of wood. By that representation the plaintiff was induced to store goods in the warehouse. The warehouse caught fire from another building on the window frames, and with its contents was consumed. Held, that a nonsuit on the ground that the representation was a mere opinion was error. Hickey v. Morrell, 55 R. 824.

W. shipped cotton to New Orleans by railroad, taking a through bill of lading. The railroad company, a warehouseman, and a steamboat company, had a general contract by which the railroad agreed to receive cotton from shippers and deliver to the warehouseman, who agreed to hold it till the arrival of the steamboat, and then ship thereon for New Orleans. W. knew nothing of this contract. Held, that the railroad company could not bind W. by a contract with the warehouseman in reference to W.'s cotton, which would relieve the warehouseman from the consequences of his own negligence, or impose on W. the consequences of the contributory negligence of the railroad company. Merchants' Wharfbat Assoc. v. Wood, 60 R. 76.

The cotton being burned while in the hands of the warehouseman, who had failed to ship by the first boat for New Orleans, but had awaited the departure of the boat with whose owner he had the general contract above alluded to, — held, that if he, as a man of ordinary prudence, had notice from the surrounding circumstances of the danger from fire to which the cotton was exposed, it was his duty to ship it by the first opportunity. Ib.

But if the fire did not occur from any of the causes which should have reasonably excited apprehension, but from another and distant source, not a cause of reasonable apprehension of danger from fire, then the warehouseman was not liable for the loss. Ib.

It being lawful in Mississippi for railroads and steamboats to do business on Sunday, a wharfbat proprietor is liable for negligence in not shipping goods on Sunday, if it is his custom so to ship goods. Ib.

8. Liability for losses or failure to deliver. — A warehouseman is not liable for goods stolen by his servant, without negligence on his part. Schmidt v. Blood, 24 D. 143.

The onus of showing negligence is on the plaintiff in such a case, unless there is a total default in delivering or accounting for the goods. Schmidt v. Blood 24 D. 143; Clafin v. Meyer, 31 R. 467.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

Defendants had in their possession, as warehousemen, goods of plaintiff, a part of which they failed to deliver to him. In an action of assumpsit for non-delivery, — held, that the burden of proof was on defendants to show either a delivery, or that they had used ordinary care in keeping the goods. Boies v. Hartford etc. R. R. Co., 9 R. 347.

In an action against a warehouseman for the loss of goods by fire, alleged to have been occasioned by his negligence, the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show such negligence. Denton v. Chicago etc. R'y Co., 35 R. 263.

Warehousemen are not insurers against loss by accidental fire. Aldrich v. Boston etc. R. R. Co., 97 D. 74.

Where a warehouseman receives grain on storage, and puts it in a bin with his own and that belonging to others, and sells therefrom, always reserving enough to answer the demand of each owner, he is not liable to the depositors for loss by fire not attributable to his fault. Rice v. Nixon, 49 R. 430.

If a warehouseman receive goods, he cannot dispute the title of the bailor in a suit brought by that person against him; but if the goods were taken from the bailee by lawful process, he may show this in excuse for not delivering them. Burton v. Wilkinson, 46 D. 146.

In an action against a warehouseman for loss of certain cattle which were shown to have escaped while being driven to water by defendant's servants, expert evidence is admissible, for the purpose of showing the degree of care which was used, as to how many hands would be necessary to drive the same number of animals of the same kind under similar circumstances, this matter not being one within the common knowledge of the jurors. North Missouri R. R. Co. v. Akers, 96 D. 183.

In an action against a railroad company as warehouseman and forwarder, for loss of oil by leakage, as the result of its neglect and want of ordinary care, recovery may be had for such loss as plaintiff can establish to the satisfaction of the jury by competent and admissible evidence; he is not required to prove to a mathematical certainty the amount of oil lost. Baltimore etc. R. R. Co. v. Schumacher, 96 D. 510.

Warehousemen are responsible for due care in storing goods in a place of reasonable safety, and are chargeable with loss only upon proof of their own negligence, or that of their servants in the course of their employment. Aldrich v. Boston etc. R. R. Co., 97 D. 74.

Warehousemen are not liable for a loss resulting from a failure of their servants to rescue goods in the warehouse from destruction by an accidental fire in the night, at which such servants are present, but not in the course of their employment. Ib.

A custom among warehousemen that when goods are placed in a warehouse other than the particular one to which they are consigned, they are allowed to remain there, will not excuse the real consignee for liability for loss of the goods, if caused by his neglect in allowing them to be stored in a warehouse less secure than his own. Vincent v. Rather, 98 D. 516.

Warehousemen who advertise that goods consigned to them will be stored in a fire-proof house are liable if they store them in a wooden house which is less safe, and afterwards burned, and this even though the goods were shipped to and stored in the warehouse of the wrong consignee, if, after the discovery of the mistake by the real consignees, they allow the goods to remain in such warehouse. Ib.

Assumpsit will lie against a warehouseman for damages for the breach of his contract to deliver, on demand, wheat stored with him; and though trover might also lie, the rule that a party cannot waive the tort and sue in assumpsit for money had and received, unless money has actually been received, has no application to such a case. Leonard v. Dunton, 99 D. 568.

The measure of damages against a warehouseman sued in assumpsit for breach of his contract, in failing to deliver on demand wheat stored with him, is the value of the wheat at the time it should have been delivered. Ib.

Where a warehouseman receives wheat and stores it, agreeing to keep it for a short time without charge, and deliver it on demand, and is afterwards sued in assumpsit for damages in failing to deliver, the action is not defeated by a neglect or refusal to pay storage after the demand to deliver is made. In such case, the warehouseman is entitled to storage only after notice that it would be charged is given. Ib.

9. Transfers of goods stored by warehousemen. — The assignee of a mass of grain in a warehouse belonging to a number of persons, who by reason of its intermingling have become owners in common, is trustee for all the parties in interest; and where there is a deficiency in the quantity of the grain, and in consequence the several owners are unable to show the respective quantities due them from the mass, a court of equity will have jurisdiction to bring such trustee and all the parties before it, and to do complete justice between them. Dole v. Olmstead, 85 D. 397.

Where a warehouseman having in store grain of various persons, for which he has given receipts, together with grain of his own (the whole being kept in one common bulk by the consent of all parties), transfers, by verbal assignment, all the grain thus in store to a creditor to secure his debt, to be held subject to the rights of the different owners, the assignee will hold the property as a trustee for the benefit of all parties in interest, and will be bound to deliver to the receipt-holders all the grain which belonged to them and which was in store at the time of assignment, but beyond that will incur no liability; and whatever grain was in store belonging to the warehouseman, the assignee will have the right to retain and apply to his own debt. Ib.

On an assignment by a warehouseman of a bulk of grain in a warehouse to secure his own debt, such grain consisting partly of his own and partly of that stored with him, and for which he has given receipts, and there is included in the assignment contracts for the purchase of grain made by the warehouseman, upon which he had advanced some money and received a portion of the grain, the assignee becomes the equitable owner of such contracts, to the exclusion entirely of the holders of the grain receipts from the warehouseman; and the assignee has the right to complete such contracts, and appropriate the grain he may receive upon them to his own debt, after deducting the money he advanced to complete them. Ib.

On an assignment by a warehouseman of a mass of grain, for the purpose of securing his debt, where such grain was partly his own and partly stored by persons who took his receipts therefor, the assignee purchasing any of such receipts would be subject to sustain his pro rata share of the loss occasioned by any deficiency precisely as would the original holders. Ib.

The assignee of a warehouseman acquires no interest in corn stored with his assignor, and for which the latter has given receipts to the real owners; and if such assignee sells the corn, and appropriates the proceeds to his own use, he will be liable to the holders of the receipts for the amount received by him, with interest thereon from the date of the sale. Dole v. Olmstead, 89 D. 386.

A warehouseman, having in store wheat of his own, may effectually pledge part of it to secure his own debt, by his warehouse receipt, and without separating the wheat from the mass. Merchants' etc. Bank v. Hibbard, 42 R. 465.

10. Bonded warehouses. — The provision in the act of Congress of March 28, 1854, that goods deposited in a private bonded warehouse shall be at the exclusive risk of the owner or importer, was for the exclusive benefit of the U. S. government, and does not relieve a warehouse-keeper from the duty of exercising ordinary care and prudence in protecting goods committed to his keeping, nor from the obligations of other warehousemen to their patrons. Schwerin v. McKie, 10 R. 581.

Where goods have been deposited with bonded warehousemen, upon which the duties have been paid, their failure to deliver them when demanded casts upon them the onus of accounting for the same. And, in an action against them for refusing to deliver the goods, interest upon their value is a proper item of damages. Ib.

In such an action, the defendants gave evidence tending to show that their warehouse was broken open and the goods removed by burglars, although the defendants had used reasonable precautions to protect their warehouse from burglars. The court charged the jury, in substance, that, to make this defense available, the evidence must be such that from it they could fairly assume that the goods were lost by means of the burglary. Held, that this charge was not erroneous. Ib.

WASTE.

[Includes what acts on the part of one in possession of land in which another has an interest constitute waste, and the remedies therefor.]

Liability of tenant for, see LANDLORD AND TENANT, 27.

Staying, by injunction, see INJUNCTION, 37.

1. What constitutes waste, generally. — Waste, in this country, is not to be defined by the rules in the English law in all respects, and from the situation of this country the cutting of timber for the purpose of clearing the land is not waste. What shall be deemed waste must, in a considerable degree, be left to the jury upon the evidence; but if trees be cut, not for the sake of clearing the land, but for sale, it is waste. Ward v. Sheppard, 2 D. 625.

Waste is whatever tends to the destruction of the inheritance or to its depreciation in value, and may be committed of land as well as in houses and timber. Wilds v. Layton, 12 D. 91; Smith v. Sharpe, 57 D. 574.

Waste is the abuse or destructive use of property by him who has not an absolute, unqualified title; trespass is an injury or unauthorized use of another's property by one who has no right whatever. Duwall v. Waters, 18 D. 350.

Eventual waste is that done by an admitted particular tenant, after the institution of a suit involving the title, or a partition suit. Ib.

An act is not waste which is not prejudicial to the inheritance, as a general rule. Pyncheon v. Stearns, 45 D. 207.

Erecting new houses or opening a way on premises is not waste, though cellars are dug under the houses, and drains are made on each side of the way. Ib.

Raising the surface of land by depositing earth thereon is not waste in Massachusetts, unless prejudicial to the inheritance. Ib.

Tearing boards from buildings and destroying fences is waste. Clemence v. Steere, 53 D. 621.

Taking rock from a bluff within the boundaries of a right of way granted over another's land, for use in macadamizing streets and building culverts, amounts to a commission of waste, which will be enjoined at the suit of the proprietor of the land. Smith v. Rome, 63 D. 298.

An insolvent debtor's use of his estate for its ordinary purposes, according to its nature, cannot be impeached for fraudulent waste. He may sell, in the usual way, the lumber, fire-wood, coal, ore, fruit, or grain produced by his land, without violating the rights of lien-holders. Witmer's Appeal, 84 D. 505.

2. — as between landlord and tenant. — Where wood is cut down on leased land by the lessee or his assigns in such a manner as materially to injure the inherance, it is waste, and the lessee is liable to an action for the breach of the covenant against waste; and where there was a right of re-entry for a breach of the covenants, — held, that the lessor could maintain ejectment. Where wild and uncultivated land, wholly covered with wood and timber, is leased, the lessee may fell part of the wood and timber, so as to fit the land for cultivation, without being liable for waste; but he cannot cut down all the wood and timber, so as permanently to injure the inheritance. Jackson v. Brownson, 5 D. 258.

A tenant is generally responsible for all waste done to the premises, not caused by the act of God or the public enemy, or the acts of the lessor himself. And where a house, which a lessee for a year held under a lease without special covenants, was destroyed by an armed mob, which the lessee had reason to believe would attack the house on account of his using the same for the purpose of distributing a certain newspaper, — held, that the lessee was liable in an action on the case, in the nature of waste. White v. Wagner, 7 D. 674.

A change of nature of property by a tenant is not waste in Massachusetts, unless prejudicial to the inheritance, as by converting arable land into woodland, meadow into pasture, or the like; but it is held otherwise in England, because such alterations change the course of husbandry. Pyncheon v. Stearns, 45 D. 207.

3. — tenants in common. — A tenant in common is not guilty of destructive waste, in removing fixtures from a mill out of use for want of repairs, and using them temporarily in a mill of his own; nor in burning rotten and useless timber attached to the mill-dam. Dodd v. Watson, 72 D. 577.

When one of the several tenants in common of a mine is working it in the usual way, and not excluding his co-tenants, he may not be called to account to them in an action for damages as for waste, nor restrained from thus working the mine. McCord v. Oakland Quicksilver Mining Co., 49 R. 686.

4. — life tenant and remainderman. — A tenant for life is liable to account for waste where he has cut down more of the wood on the estate than is necessary to the enjoyment of his estate, to the injury of the remainder in fee. Johnson v. Johnson, 29 D. 72. Although the object is to restore the land to pasture, as it originally was when the life estate commenced, and although it might have been good husbandry in an owner of the fee to have so restored it. Clark v. Holden, 66 D. 450.

A remainderman can not maintain an action for waste after taking a lease from the tenant of the preceding estate for years, for his full term, for part of the land, as to the part of the land so leased, whether the waste was committed before or after the lease, for the estates to that extent are thereby merged; so, though the lease reserves to the lessor the right to erect buildings on the leased premises, and provides for the payment of rent, if there is no reservation of a right of re-entry for non-payment. Pyncheon v. Stearns, 45 D. 207.

An action of waste by reversioner against life tenant is provided for by statute in Rhode Island, and the liability of the life tenant therein, though very stringent, is to be fairly and reasonably enforced. Clemence v. Steere, 53 D. 621.

Converting meadow into pasture by life tenant is waste in England, but not so in Rhode Island, unless detrimental to the inheritance and contrary to the ordinary course of good husbandry. Ib.

Permitting pasture to become overgrown with brush is waste on the part of a tenant for life in England, but not so in Rhode Island, unless there be such neglect in cutting the brush as a man of ordinary prudence would not permit. Ib.

A life tenant cutting and selling wood is guilty of waste, he having a right to cut wood only for fuel and repairs; but if the reversioner assents to the cutting and sale, he cannot claim a forfeiture on their account, and if the estate is by will charged with the comfortable support of the tenant, and the wood cut and sold went for the tenant's support, that fact is to be considered in determining the question of assent. Ib.

Cutting hoop-poles is waste by a life tenant, unless that is the ordinary mode of managing the farm, but not otherwise. Ib.

A life tenant is not bound to repair a house which is out of repair when received, if not reparable, or if the expense of repairing it would exceed its value; otherwise, if repairs would make it tenantable. Ib.

Destruction by life tenant of a house not tenantable is waste, unless it be with the reversioner's consent; and the life tenant is liable, even if the house be torn down without his permission after his leaving the premises. Ib.

The removal of a crib erected by life tenant not annexed to freehold is not waste. Ib.

Tearing down an old and unstable barn which is in danger of falling and injuring the life tenant's cattle is not waste, unless its condition was due to the tenant's neglect to repair. Ib.

Waste forfeits the part of premises wasted, but by a destruction of the dwelling-house the whole premises are forfeited. Ib.

Changing an estate from pasture to woodland by tenant in dower, in suffering wood to grow up on land which was pasture before, is not waste. Clark v. Holden, 66 D. 450.

A tenant for life has no right to commit waste under a reservation of "all the right, title and interest in and unto the above-named land and premises for and during my natural life." Webster v. Webster, 66 D. 705.

Evidence is not competent on the question of waste, of the practice of the tenant for life in using the land when he was the owner in fee-simple. Ib.

A tenant for life is not chargeable with waste committed to injury of remainderman, unless the evidence affirmatively shows such facts as will sustain the charge; and the presumption is in favor of the tenant for life until the contrary appears. Lynn's Appeal, 72 D. 721.

5. Remedies, generally. — In the application of the law of waste, regard must be had to the circumstances of a new and unsettled country. Findlay v. Smith, 8 D. 733.

At the time the waste is committed, the party must have title to the land to sustain his action for the injury. Hughlett v. Harris, 12 D. 104.

The common-law remedies against waste were: A prohibition commanding the sheriff to prevent its being done, and a writ of waste after the injury had been done, to recover the place wasted and treble damages. Duvall v. Waters, 18 D. 350.

There was no process at common law to prevent a threatened trespass upon realty, however great or irreparable. Ib.

A writ of estrepement lay at common law in aid of an action to recover real property, to prevent any injury being done thereto pending the controversy. This remedy is corrective as well as preventive; for if the prohibition is violated the plaintiff may recover damages. Ib.

This writ is treated as a remedy against waste, but where there is no privity of title between the parties in the action to which it is auxiliary, the injury which it seeks to prevent is, in chancery acceptation, trespass rather than waste. Ib.

To prevent waste, pending a suit to determine a title, the only remedy in England seems to be the writ of estrepement which has fallen into disuse; although in a variety of other cases the court of chancery exercises its conservative power to protect the subject of litigation from waste, injury, or loss, pending a suit. Ib.

6. — by action for damages. — An action may be maintained by a remainderman or reversioner after the purchase by him of the particular estate, for waste committed before. Dupree v. Dupree, 69 D. 757.

An action for waste is not defeated by the transfer of the premises, pending the action, by the plaintiff to the defendant. Dickinson v. Mayor, 30 R. 492.

Damages must be assessed in an action of waste for the place wasted over and above the value of the place. Clemence v. Steere, 53 D. 621.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume L.

7. — by injunction. — Equity has jurisdiction to restrain a tenant for life from wasting the property, or to compel him to give security to have the personalty forthcoming at the termination of the life estate. Smith v. Daniel, 16 D. 641.

Only under special circumstances will the court grant an injunction where waste has been committed by a tenant, to prevent his removing timber which had been cut. Ordinarily, it will only interfere to prevent or stay future waste. Watson v. Hunter, 9 D. 296.

An injunction lies to stay waste whenever an action of waste would lie, whether there is any privity of title or not, and in other cases where such an action could not be brought. Duvall v. Waters, 18 D. 350.

An injunction and account of past waste may be sought in one suit, but a bill for an account of waste will not lie where an injunction cannot be asked or granted. Ib.

In England, an injunction to stay waste will be granted where there is a subsisting privity of title or contract admitted by the answer, or an uncontroverted legal or equitable title in the plaintiff; but not where the bill states that the defendant relies upon an alleged adverse title in himself, or where the plaintiff's title is positively denied by the answer. Ib.

An injunction to stay waste pending litigation lies wherever an action at law or suit in equity has been brought, in which the title has been or may be drawn in question, whether the subject of the controversy be realty or personalty. Ib.

Privity of title or contract is unnecessary to support the injunction in such cases. Ib.

Such injunction is auxiliary to the suit or action involving the title, and follows its fate. Ib.

Denial of the plaintiff's title in the answer does not warrant the dissolution of an injunction against waste pending the suit. Ib.

Ordinary use and cultivation are not inhibited by such an injunction. Ib.

A separate bill for an injunction against waste, pending a suit here to try the title, is irregular; the relief should be sought by a petition in the original suit. Ib.

Injunctions to stay waste are granted almost as a matter of course. Smith v. City Council, 63 D. 298.

8. — or order to stay waste. — A remainderman has a right to an order to stay waste on premises in which he is interested. Miles v. Miles, 64 D. 362.

1. What is a watercourse. — A watercourse is a channel or canal for conveyance of water, particularly in draining lands; it may be natural, as when it is made by the natural flow of the water, caused by the general superficies of the surrounding land from which the water is collected into one channel, or it may be artificial, as in the case of a ditch or other artificial means used to divert the water from its natural channel, or to carry it from low lands, from which it will not flow in consequence of the nature of the surface of the surrounding land. Earl v. DeHart, 72 D. 395.

A watercourse is ancient if the channel through which it naturally runs has existed from time immemorial. Ib.

The question whether a watercourse is ancient does not depend upon the quantity of water discharged by it. Ib.

An ancient natural watercourse exists where the face of the country is such as necessarily to collect in one body so large a quantity of water, after heavy rains and the melting of large bodies of snow, as to require an outlet to some common reservoir, and where such water is regularly discharged through a well-defined channel, which the force of the water has made for itself, and which is the accustomed channel through which it flows and has flowed from time immemorial. Ib.

Where surface water, supplied by the falling rains and melting snow from a hilly region or high bluffs, by the natural formation of the ground is forced to seek an outlet through a gorge or ravine, and by its flow assumes a definite and natural channel through which it escapes at regular seasons, and such has always been the case within the memory of man, one adjacent land-owner has no right to obstruct such flow, to the damage of another. Gibbs v. Williams, 37 R. 241.

But there must be a distinct channel, the bed of a stream, with well-defined banks, cut through the turf and into the soil by the flowing of the water, presenting on a casual glance to every eye the unmistakable evidences of the frequent action of running water, and not a mere depression; and such flow must be necessary to prevent the flooding of a considerable tract of land. Ib.

A lake, when fed by streams and having a natural channel, and whose waters find exit by percolation in a perceptible current through a bed of gravel, is a running stream, and may not be obstructed so as to set back upon the lands of another. Hebron Gravel Road Co. v. Harvey, 46 R. 199.

In an action for the diversion of a watercourse it appeared that, at a point on defendant's land about five rods from plaintiff's land, the water ceased to flow between defined banks, but spread out over the surface of the ground, and so ran to and across plaintiff's land, and then began to flow again in a defined channel. Held, that the stream did not cease to be a natural watercourse, and that plaintiff could maintain the action. Macomber v. Godfrey, 11 R. 349.

2. Right to the use of the stream. —

1. General rules.—Every riparian owner has equal right to use of water in a natural stream running through his land, for every useful purpose to which it can be applied, as it is wont to run, without diminution or alteration, but he cannot use it to the prejudice of any proprietor above or below him, unless he has acquired a right to do so by grant, license, or prescription. Wadsworth v. Tillotson, 39 D. 391; Society v. Morris Canal Co., 21 D. 41; Phumleigh v. Dawson, 41 D. 199; Tillotson v. Smith, 64 D. 355; Stein v. Burden, 65 D. 394. He is liable to owners below him only for an entire diversion or abstraction of the water in such stream, or for an unreasonable use thereof. Elliot v. Fitchburg R. R. Co., 57 D. 85. Such owner may use the entire stream for manufacturing purposes, provided that the water is returned to the channel for the benefit of those below, and that parties having prior rights are not injured thereby. Society v. Morris Canal Co., 21 D. 41.

An owner of land has a legal right to the use of a stream of water which has flowed through it immemorially, and the violation of such right is a private nuisance. Gardner v. Newburgh, 7 D. 526.

Property in water, and in the use and enjoyment of it, is as sacred as the right to the soil over which it flows. Campbell v. Smith, 14 D. 400.

Use of water in a flowing stream is open to all, subject to the restriction that a person is not permitted to use it to the injury of those through whose land it passes. Hoy v. Sterrett, 27 D. 313.

The right of a riparian owner to the use of water flowing in a natural stream through his land is not an easement or appurtenance, but is annexed to the soil and is parcel of the land. Wadsworth v. Tillotson, 39 D. 391.

Property in water is usufructuary, and consists not so much in the ownership of the fluid itself as the advantage of its use. Eddy v. Simpson, 58 D. 408.

Party over whose land a stream flows has a right to its reasonable use during its passage. The right is not in the corpus of the water, and only continues with its possession; nor can a party reclaim water that he has lost. Ib.

Riparian proprietor has not a right to use a reasonable quantity of water for purposes of his business, but only a right to such use as he can make of the water without materially diminishing it in quantity or corrupting it in quality. Wheatley v. Chrisman, 64 D. 657.

Riparian proprietor may conduct water to any part of his land, and use it so diverted for the same purposes and to the same extent as when flowing in its natural channel, and may recover the same damages for any loss from interference by another. Ib.

Running water is not and cannot be made the subject of private ownership so long as it continues to flow in its natural course. A right may be acquired to its use, which will be regarded and protected as property, but this right carries with it no specific property in the water itself. Kidd v. Laird, 76 D. 472.

Every proprietor of land on banks of a stream has, naturally, equal right to the use of the water, and this right to use implies a right to control it, and to a reasonable extent to diminish its volume. Davis v. Getchell, 79 D. 636.

2. Rights of prior appropriators.—The right by prior appropriation has regard to the quantum of water withdrawn from a stream common to both parties, and not to the quantum of fall. McCalmont v. Whitaker, 23 D. 102.

A riparian proprietor can acquire no exclusive privilege in running water by mere priority of appropriation. Hoy v. Sterrett, 27 D. 313.

A party and his privies are estopped from claiming the water of a stream by right of prior appropriation, when such party has stood by and seen another appropriate the water at great expense without informing the latter of his prior right. Parke v. Kilham, 68 D. 310.

A prior right to the use of natural water of a stream does not entitle the owner of such a right to the exclusive use of the channel. So long as his water right is not interfered with, there is no reason why the bed of the stream may not be used by others as a channel for conducting water. If such prior owner receives his full supply, as prior to the use of the channel by others to carry water introduced therein, he has no cause for complaint. Butte C. & D. Co. v. Vaughn, 70 D. 769.

Percolating water, collected and running in a defined channel, is property, the use of which is acquirable by grant or appropriation. Cross v. Kitts, 58 R. 558.

3. What is a reasonable use. — After a conveyance of a part of a stream of water, a change in the mode of using it, which does not increase the quantity, is not actionable. Bullen v. Runnels, 9 D. 55.

The water power to which a riparian owner is entitled consists of the difference between the surface of the water in its natural state, where it first touches his land, and the surface where it leaves it. McCalmont v. Whitaker, 23 D. 102.

The reasonableness of the use of water in a stream by a riparian owner depends upon the quantity taken, the size of the stream, and various other circumstances. Elliot v. Fitchburg R. R. Co., 57 D. 85.

What is a reasonable use of water in a stream has been in some cases so long settled by common consent, or is so obvious in itself, that it is determinable as matter of law. Snow v. Parsons, 67 D. 723.

The reasonableness of the use of a stream, when it is not settled by custom, and is in its nature doubtful, is a question of fact to be determined by the tribunal trying the facts. Ib.

Riparian proprietor must be allowed to use a stream in such a manner as to make it useful to himself, even if it do produce slight inconvenience to those below; consequently, in an action against a tanner for discharging waste bark into a stream, to plaintiff's injury, evidence which tends to show that tanneries cannot be operated to any useful purpose without thus disposing of their waste bark is admissible and very material. Ib.

In determining what would be a reasonable use of a stream by a tanner, evidence that it had been a universal custom and practice to discharge spent bark of tanneries into streams on which they were situated, ever since the country was first settled, is admissible, and if proved would have almost the force of a law. Ib.

The different owners of lands through which a stream flows are each entitled to a reasonable use of the same, and an injury to one owner incidental to the reasonable use of the stream by another, gives no right of redress. Dumont v. Kellogg, 18 R. 102.

Thus, where it was alleged that defendant, who was owner of lands upon a stream above plaintiff, by constructing a dam with a large reservoir, caused a material diminution of the flow of the stream through plaintiff's lands by reason of evaporation, etc., — held, that plaintiff could not maintain an action therefor. Ib.

In determining the question of reasonable use, the jury are entitled to consider the general usage of the country in similar cases. Ib.

4. Liability for improper use. — An improper or malicious use of flowing water by one riparian proprietor renders him liable in damages to another lower down on the same stream. Hoy v. Sterrett, 27 D. 313.

The doctrine that a riparian owner has a right to the reasonable use of waters of a stream does not apply to the case of one who erects a dam, breakwater, or other obstruction, so as to turn the current of the stream over onto the land of another, for the purpose of protecting his own land from the encroachment of the stream. Gerrish v. Clough, 97 D. 561.

5. Floating logs. — In the absence of prescription or user, it is not a public right to float logs down a non-navigable stream which is only fit for that purpose during periodical freshets; the bed and banks of such a stream are under the absolute ownership and control of the riparian owner. Hubbard v. Bell, 5 R. 98.

A conveyance by the state of all its right, title and interest in and to the land over which a stream passes does not convey to the grantee any exclusive right of property in the easement for the passage of logs upon the stream, and does not authorize him, nor those claiming under him, to use exclusively, or to destroy, the public easement existing upon the stream at the date of its execution. Treat v. Lord, 66 D. 298.

One has the right to use a public stream in a proper and reasonable manner to float his logs, and if they strand on the land of a riparian owner, he is not liable for any injury thereby to the land, unless negligent, and may enter upon such land to reclaim the logs; but is liable for any improper use of the stream or unnecessary injury to the land. Carter v. Thurston, 42 R. 584.

6. Illustrations. — Plaintiff established a dam and acquired a water right upon a certain stream. Defendant did likewise upon another stream. After defendant had used the water at his dam it found its way by natural courses into plaintiff's stream above his said dam. Defendant afterwards erected a dam above plaintiff's, and interfered with his flow of water, claiming the right to withdraw from said stream as much water as flows into it from his first-mentioned stream. Held, that when the water left defendant's dam he lost all right to and interest in it, and when it joined the stream in possession of plaintiff, plaintiff became entitled thereto, and defendant could not withdraw it. Eddy v. Simpson, 58 D. 408.

The owners of land on opposite sides of a stream agreed by covenant, running with the land, jointly to erect a dam, each to have the use of half of the water. The title to the land passed by various intermediate conveyances to plaintiff on one side of the stream, and defendant on the other. Held, that an action on the case would lie by plaintiff against defendant for using more than half of the water. In such a case nothing less than an absolute denial of the right to one-half of the water, followed by an enjoyment inconsistent with its existence for a period of twenty-one years or more, can amount to an extinguishment of it. Lindeman v. Lindsey, 8 R. 219.

3. Right to natural flow of the stream. — The common-law rule as to water-rights is that each owner of land through which a stream of water flows, is entitled to have it flow in its natural course, and may have an action for any diversion of it to his injury. Martin v. Bigelow, 16 D. 696.

Inferior proprietor has a right to uninterrupted flow of water in surface watercourse leading to his land over the land of an adjoining proprietor. Haldeman v. Bruckhart, 84 D. 511.

There must be a previous appropriation of the water to some use by such land-owner before he can be said to sustain any damage. Martin v. Bigelow, 16 D. 696.

The common-law rule is modified in Vermont as being inapplicable to our circumstances. Ib.

Where one introduces water into a stream and then diverts a portion of the stream, and does not permit it to flow through the land of a riparian proprietor below, the latter cannot complain if the quantity and quality of the stream as it flowed in its natural state, are not diminished or altered. Society v. Morris Canal Co., 21 D. 41.

A mill-owner may change the character and use of his mill at pleasure, if his neighbor's mill is not injured thereby and the water is restored to its accustomed channel. Blanchard v. Baker, 23 D. 504.

A man is entitled to the enjoyment of a stream in its natural flow; it is not enough that one who has diverted the water has left what could be utilized by expense and trouble. Crooker v. Bragg, 25 D. 555.

One through whose lands a stream naturally flows is entitled to have the whole pass through it, though he may not require the whole or any part for the use of machinery. Ib.

The volume of water which flows in a creek in winter and spring is generally no criterion whatever as to the quantity of water which flows in the summer and fall. Burden v. Stein, 62 D. 758.

An artificial watercourse constructed by contributions of several riparian owners is subject, in absence of a special contract, to substantially the same rules as govern the use of a natural one. Each proprietor of a lot is entitled to the benefit of the fall of the water upon his own land, but cannot abridge the same right existing in either of the neighboring proprietors on either side of him. Townsend v. McDonald, 64 D. 508.

A lake can be drained only by the natural outlet, for the owners along a creek forming such outlet have a legal right to the natural flow of the waters of the lake through it, and any artificial drain would deprive them of this flow. Mohr v. Gault, 78 D. 687.

It is not essential to a watercourse that the banks should be absolutely unchangeable; the flow constant, the size uniform, or the waters entirely unmixed with earth, or flowing with any fixed velocity. Bassett v. Salisbury Mfg. Co., 82 D. 179.

An inferior proprietor has no right to the uninterrupted flow of water from an unknown subterranean stream which flows out upon his land in the form of springs or otherwise, from that of his neighbor. He has no servitude in such a stream upon the land of his neighbor which he has a natural right to enforce. Haldeman v. Bruckhart, 84 D. 511.

An inferior owner has no right to percolations or filtrations from the land of his neighbor. Ib.

A well-marked distinction between flowage of water in surface and sub-surface channels discussed and explained. Ib.

A riparian proprietor has no property in water itself, and it cannot be appropriated to his exclusive use; although, it seems, that for the purpose of irrigation and other natural uses, he may entirely consume the stream; and he may use the momentum of the stream as a power, or turn the stream on his land by a dam or other means. Rhodes v. Whitehead, 84 D. 631.

4. Use of stream for irrigation.* — The proprietor of land through which a stream flows may employ its momentum as a power for beneficial purposes, and may use the water for domestic purposes, to water stock, and for irrigation, provided there be no unreasonable detention or essential diminution of it. Blanchard v. Baker, 23 D. 504.

The right of irrigation can be exercised only by restoring the water not wanted for that purpose to its accustomed channel. Ib.

5. Title acquired for adverse possession.† — Adverse right may exist in a stream, founded upon a prior occupation by another. Society v. Morris Canal Co., 21 D. 41.

There is no actual property in running water, but the interest therein is of a usufructuary kind, though it may be nevertheless vested and absolute. Ib.

After a lapse of twenty years, during which adverse possession of a water-right has been continuously maintained, a grant will be presumed in favor of the adverse holder; but possession for the full period is indispensably necessary to defeat the right of the proprietor of the ancient channel. Campbell v. Smith, 14 D. 400.

The presumption of a grant of the right to water does not arise from the mere submission of the owner to an adverse enjoyment thereof, for a period less than twenty years. Ib.

A right to divert a stream, running through another's land, may be acquired by adverse enjoyment for twenty years. Coalter v. Hunter, 15 D. 726.

A mere license to divert a stream, or a loan of the use of it, cannot be ripened into a right by lapse of time. Ib.

The use of a stream for the purposes of a drain, not being adverse, gives no prescriptive right. Baker v. Boston, 22 D. 421.

A mill privilege not yet occupied is a valuable property which no one can legally impair or destroy by diverting from it the natural flow of the stream, although it may be impaired by the exercise of certain lawful rights originating in prior occupancy. Blanchard v. Baker, 23 D. 504.

The prior appropriation of water of a stream by a riparian proprietor, confers no exclusive right to the use of it as against another riparian proprietor, unless the latter's rights are impaired by grant or license, or the prior appropriation has continued adversely for more than twenty years. Heath v. Williams, 43 D. 265.

Twenty years' open and continuous use of water of a stream by a riparian owner gives a prior right against a lower owner, even though the latter has no need of the water during that time, and the lower owner has only a waste-water privilege. Olney v. Fenner, 57 D. 711.

Title by prescription is raised by a uniform and uninterrupted diversion of water for the period prescribed by the statute of limitations; and the water may be used or applied in various ways, but no material change, injurious to other owners, will be allowed. Stein v. Burden, 60 D. 453.

Adverse enjoyment for twenty years, of a water-course, by one riparian owner, to the prejudice of another, will establish a right; but mere non-user by one proprietor will not enlarge the right of a neighbor. Townsend v. McDonald, 64 D. 508; Pillsbury v. Moore, 69 D. 91.

The right to use of water is acquired in a particular manner by uninterrupted adverse enjoyment of such use for over twenty years. Pillsbury v. Moore, 69 D. 91.

Adverse enjoyment by another is what destroys owner's right to use of water. Ib.

6. Right to cut ice.* — A riparian proprietor exercises a valuable privilege in cutting ice, and trespass creating an obstruction which prevents it justifies a finding of damages for this as a direct consequence of the injury. Lorman v. Benson, 77 D. 435.

A riparian owner on a navigable stream has no superior right to the ice formed in it opposite his land, but it belongs to the first appropriator. Wood v. Fowler, 40 R. 330.

A riparian owner on a navigable stream above tide-water owns the ice formed in it opposite his land to the center. Washington Ice Co. v. Shortall, 40 R. 196.

A street bounded on a navigable stream, above high-water mark, extends to the center of the stream, in the absence of evidence of a contrary intention, and the adjacent lot-owners are entitled to the ice formed on that portion of the stream. Village of Brooklyn v. Smith, 44 R. 90.

The owner of a mill-dam on an unnavigable stream, who does not own the bed of the stream above the dam, has no interest in the ice formed upon it, and where he maliciously and unnecessarily draws down the pond and destroys the ice field, he is liable in damages to the riparian owner who owns the land under the pond. Stevens v. Kelley, 57 R. 813.

7. Right to erect dams. — One who has acquired a prescriptive right to construct a dam on a stream must nevertheless use ordinary care and diligence in making repairs in the dam so as not to injure those below. Lapham v. Curtis, 26 D. 310.

One who builds a dam across a stream is bound so to construct it that it will resist not only ordinary freshets, but also such extraordinary floods as may be reasonably anticipated. Gray v. Harris, 9 R. 61.

While the state has the power to require fishways to be made in dams, it cannot impose the expense of making such ways in dams already constructed, as that would be a taking of private property for public use without just compensation. Com. v. Pennsylvania Canal Co., 5 R. 329.

8. Right to take gravel from stream. — The soil in navigable rivers below low-water mark, as well as the use of the stream for purposes of navigation, belongs to the public, and the title is vested in the state for the use of the public, and a grant from the state to an individual, under the general land laws, which purports to include the bed of such a navigable stream, and to give the grantee the exclusive privilege of taking sand, gravel and other deposits from the bed of the stream, is to this extent void. Goodwin v. Thompson, 54 R. 410.

9. Sales and conveyances of water-rights. — A grant of a stream of water, or of a part thereof, by fixed boundaries, cannot be made except by a deed duly executed and recorded; but a grant will be presumed from an adverse occupation for twenty years. Bullen v. Runnels, 9 D. 55.

A contract to sell the privilege of water in the state in which it then was, is violated by a subsequent sale of a branch line from the principal line of water-pipes. Durrett v. Simpson, 16 D. 115.

If a vendor, owning a tract of land over which he has dug a trench to carry water to his mill on the lower part of the tract, sells the upper part without expressly reserving the water-right, the vendee has no right to obstruct the trench and cut off this water supply, but he takes the land subject to this easement of the vendor. Seibert v. Levan, 49 D. 525.

Where the language used in a grant of a water privilege leaves it doubtful whether the intention was to limit the purpose for which the water is to be used, or only the quantity to be used, the latter construction will be favored. Dewey v. Williams, 77 D. 708.

A grant of a sufficient quantity of water for two runs of stones in a certain grist-mill limits the quantity of water to be used, and not the purpose for which it may be used. Ib.

A construction of a grant of water-power that will restrict the grantee to the specific use to which the water was applied when the grant was made will never be adopted, unless the language of the grant unmistakably shows that such was the intention of the parties. Hines v. Robinson, 99 D. 772.

The conveyance of a house and land by an ordinary warranty deed carries with it, by implication, the right which the grantor has to water running to the premises conveyed by an aqueduct from a distant spring; and a contemporaneous special deed, to the grantee, of the water privilege, containing limitations and restrictions in the use thereof, without the words "to his heirs, assigns, etc.," will not be construed to modify the estate in the water and aqueduct so as to prevent it passing by deed of the premises from such grantee to succeeding grantees, and the latter may recover damages from the original grantor for cutting off the aqueduct on adjacent land owned by him, and thus disturbing the water privilege. Coolidge v. Hager, 5 R. 256.

Where the owner of a water-power leases the use of a specific quantity of water, and the lessee habitually uses more, and threatens to persist, and the extent of such use is difficult to estimate, the lessee may be enjoined, without any allegation of injury to the lessor. Lawson v. Menasha Wooden Ware Co., 48 R. 528.

10. Remedies for obstructions. — Equity has jurisdiction, concurrent with the remedy at law, to prevent an injury to private property by interrupting an ancient water-course flowing across one's land. Belknap v. Belknap, 7 D. 548.

Obstructions in an artificial channel through which there exists a prescriptive right to flow the waters of a lake, though occasioned by natural causes, may be removed by the persons whose lands are overflowed by the rise in the lake incident to the diminished capacity of its channel of discharge, without there being any right on the part of the owner of the channel to object. Chapman v. Thames Mfg. Co., 33 D. 401.

An infringement of a legal right, which, if continued for a sufficient length of time, would form the basis of a prescriptive right, will constitute a cause of action, without its being required that any other damage be shown. Ib.

Obstructions cannot be placed in a water-course, even if it is already so obstructed that its use is prevented. Ib.

The owner of land has a prima facie right to remove a portion of a dam built upon his land by another. Richardson v. Emerson, 62 D. 694.

Equity will decree the removal of an obstruction in a watercourse as well as enjoin its future obstruction. Mari v. De Hart, 72 D. 395.

Where a quantity of water collects at different seasons of the year on complainant's land, to such an extent as requires an outlet to some common reservoir, and if such is always the case in times of heavy rain and melting of snow, and if as far back as the memory of man runs that flow of water produced a natural channel through the defendant's land, where such accumulated surplus water has always been accustomed to run, the complainant has a right to have the water discharged in the same channel for the relief of his land, and equity will enjoin the defendant from obstructing it. Ib.

The surface water on the plaintiff's land ordinarily drained into a natural water-course flowing through his land and the defendant's. The plaintiff opened a quarry on his land, and in the winter the surface-water, the snow-water and the water from small streams cut off by the excavation accumulated in the excavation. In the spring the plaintiff pumped the water from the excavation into the watercourse. During this process the flow was greater than usual, but the capacity of the watercourse was sufficient to carry it all off, together with the natural body of the stream. Defendant filled up the channel and dammed the stream, thus throwing back the water on plaintiff's land. Held, that the plaintiff could compel the removal of such obstructions, and restrict such interference with the flow of the stream. McCormick v. Horan, 37 R. 479.

11. — for flowage. — The owner of a dam on a stream is liable for damages caused thereby to private property on such stream by the ordinary and expected floods of the season, but not for those occasioned by extraordinary and unexpected floods. This principle applied in the case of a stream made navigable by law. Bell v. McOlintock, 34 D. 507.

Keeping up a dam and flowing the lands of another for twenty years, without paying damages or being questioned, is evidence of the right to maintain such dam and flow such lands, and a bar to any action for damages in so doing. This is true under the Massachusetts statutes as well as at common law. Williams v. Nelson, 34 D. 45.

The abandonment of a prescriptive right to maintain a dam and flood lands is not presumed from nine years non-user. Ib.

The owner of a dam on a watercourse may be liable for flowing back water so as to obstruct the natural drainage of land lying near, but not bordering on the watercourse, unless such obstruction was caused by a reasonable use of his own land and privilege, and what is a reasonable use is ordinarily a mixed question of law and fact. Bassett v. Salisbury Mfg. Co., 82 D. 179.

A stream flowed in a well-defined channel across a highway and through defendant's land, until a great freshet came, when it left the old channel and made a new one down the highway and flowed over plaintiff's land. Plaintiff then turned the water back to its old channel in defendant's land. Subsequently the highway surveyor, without authority, closed up the old channel and thereby caused the water to flow upon defendant's land in various places, whereupon defendant used such means to relieve his land as to cause the water to flow again in the channel formerly made by the freshet and upon plaintiff's land. Held, that this was an invasion of plaintiff's rights, for which he could maintain an action without waiting for damaging effects from the water. Tuthill v. Scott, 5 R. 301.

The owner of land planted a row of trees on his own land, and along the division line between his land and that of an adjoining proprietor, the effect of which was to obstruct the passage of driftwood carried upon the land of the adjoining proprietor by the overflow of a watercourse adjacent to the lands of both proprietors, to the injury of such adjacent land. Held, that no action would lie therefor. Taylor v. Fickas, 31 R. 114.

12. — for diverting the flow of the stream. — The owner of land may divert the water of a stream flowing through it, provided he returns the water to the same channel before it reaches the land of the proprietor below. Norton v. Volentine, 39 D. 220; Blanchard v. Baker, 23 D. 504.

The existence of an ancient channel by which water is diverted from a main stream, does not justify the deepening of the channel so as to cause a greater diversion to the injury of proprietors along the main stream. Blanchard v. Baker, 23 D. 504.

Unlawful diversion suffered for twenty years ripens into a right which cannot be controverted. Ib.

Where one diverts into a new channel the water of a stream running through his land, and then obstructs this new channel so as to carry off the water in an entirely different direction than that in which it ran before the diversion, a right of action accrues to the proprietor below, who is injured thereby. Norton v. Volentine, 39 D. 220.

Whether one may acquire a right to water in the swamp lands of another, so as to maintain an action against the latter for draining and improving his lands, whereby filtration into a running stream is destroyed and the volume of water diminished, is not decided. Thayer v. Brooks, 49 D. 474.

A legislative grant to an incorporated company, giving them the exclusive right of conducting water to a city for a term of years, confers no right upon them to divert waters of a running stream to the injury of riparian proprietors, without making compensation therefor. Stein v. Burden, 60 D. 453.

Riparian proprietors are not deprived of their common-law action for damages, where the lessee of certain city water-works fails to exercise his authority, conferred by legislative enactment, in suing out a writ of ad quod damnum, to ascertain damages sustained by such proprietors for his diversion of the water of a running stream. Ib.

A municipal corporation owning land upon a watercourse acquires no right to divert water from the stream, to the injury of other riparian proprietors, in sufficient quantities to supply the domestic wants of its inhabitants residing at a distance of from three to five miles from the stream. Ib.

Diversion of the water of a creek in violation of the right of complainant entitles him to an injunction, even though he suffer no actual damage thereby. Burden v. Stein, 62 D. 758.

One who conveys water by means of artificial canals into a natural stream in which another has a water-right by prior appropriation may afterwards divert an equal amount above the latter's dam, provided he does not injure his right. Butte O. & D. Co. v. Vaughn, 70 D. 769.

The defendant, owning the land on one side of a river, built a breakwater to prevent the water encroaching upon his land, which had the effect to throw the current over upon and wash away the plaintiff's lands opposite. Held, that defendant was liable. Gerrish v. Olough, 2 R. 165.

13. Rules of pleading and evidence in actions for diversion. — Riparian proprietor's right is not limited to the mode or quantity of his previous use. Hence it is no defense to an action for diverting water from a riparian proprietor, to show that no injury would have accrued to him if he had not changed the manner or extent of his use, because, independent of any particular use of or for it, he has the right to the flow of the water on his own land without diminution or alteration. Buddington v. Bradley, 26 D. 386.

An allegation in an action for the diversion of water, to the effect that by reason of the acts of the defendant, the plaintiff could not enjoy his land as beneficially as he otherwise might, and that he was deprived of the use and profits thereof, is sufficiently particular to admit evidence of whatever damages to his land or mill privilege the plaintiff has suffered. Parker v. Grinwold, 42 D. 739.

The riparian owner must show actual perceptible damage by diversion of the water in a stream flowing through his land, by another riparian owner, before he can recover therefor. Elliot v. Fitchburg R. R. Co., 57 D. 85.

A complaint alleging that a riparian proprietor, after diverting water, did not restore it, is good. His liability rests on the naked fact that he did not return the water; not on the reasons why he did not. Stein v. Burden, 65 D. 394.

No material variance exists between allegations and proofs when the complaint alleges that defendant wrongfully diverted the water and prevented its return, while the evidence shows that while the water was originally diverted by him he provided means for its return to its natural channel above plaintiff's land, and that its return was prevented by the act of another person after it left defendant's land. Ib.

Tenants in common may join in an action for diversion of water, since this is in the nature of a nuisance. Parke v. Kilham, 68 D. 310.

An action may be maintained in Massachusetts for diverting a stream in that state, and preventing it from coming to the plaintiff's mill in Rhode Island. Mannville Company v. City of Worcester, 52 R. 261.

A mill-owner may recover upon proof of an unlawful diversion of a stream, without proof of actual damage, in an action on the case. Blanchard v. Baker, 23 D. 504.

To prove damage from diversion of a water-course a plaintiff suing therefor may introduce evidence of the cost of constructing the defendant's mill on the same stream, and of the yearly rent of the mill, to show at what expense he, the plaintiff, might make the water available. Plumleigh v. Dawson, 41 D. 199.

Damage is presumed from a diversion of a stream. Ib.

Evidence of damage occasioned by diversion of water cannot be given by one uninformed as to the size of the stream, its supply of water, or the amount diverted. Stein v. Burden, 60 D. 453.

Evidence of actual possession, with claim of title, enables plaintiff to sue for disturbance of riparian rights, and evidence of plaintiff's want of title is irrelevant. Ib.

In an action for damages for diversion of water, defendants in possession cannot prove an older and better title in third persons, unless such persons are made parties, and the facts specially set up. Humphreys v. McCull, 70 D. 621.

The burden of proof is on the party who conveys water into a stream above another's dam, where the latter has a water-right, and who wishes to divert such water before it reaches the dam, to show that he diverts no more than he conveyed into the stream. He must show clearly to what portion he is entitled. He can claim only such portion as is established by decisive proof. The enforcement of his right must leave the opposite party in the use of the full quantity to which he was originally entitled. Butte etc. Co. v. Vaughn, 70 D. 769.

A grant of use of water may be presumed when, in an action for the wrongful diversion of the water, the jury are satisfied from the evidence that the defendants have been in the continued, adverse, uninterrupted possession, use, and enjoyment of the water in dispute for five years preceding the commencement of the action. Union Water Co. v. Crary, 85 D. 145.

14. Damages recoverable for diversion. — Damages for nuisance in diverting water can only be given for injuries actually sustained prior to the commencement of the suit. Thayer v. Brooks, 49 D. 474.

Damages accruing subsequent to commencement of action for damages by riparian proprietors are not recoverable except in a new action, but evidence of such damages is admissible to show the consequences of the original diversion. Stein v. Burden, 60 D. 453.

A riparian proprietor is entitled to nominal damages for any disturbance of his right, without proof of actual damage. Ib.

15. Remedies for contamination or pollution. — Where tan-bark thrown into a stream by defendant is annually deposited on land of plaintiff below, no right by prescription to so deposit his tan-bark arises in favor of defendant, if such deposits have only taken place for the six years last past, though he may have thrown his bark into the stream for twenty years or more. Crosby v. Bessey, 77 D. 271.

The question whether the use of a stream to carry off a manufacturer's waste is reasonable or not is one of fact for the jury, depending upon the circumstances of the case, such as the size and character of the stream, the purpose of its use, the benefit to the manufacturer, and the injury to the other riparian owners. Hayes v. Waldron, 84 D. 106.

Evidence of usage is inadmissible upon the question of reasonable use of a stream by a manufacturer in discharging waste therein. Ib.

A mill-owner has the right, in a reasonable manner, to discharge the waste from his mill, such as sawdust, shavings, etc., into the stream, in the ordinary course of using such mill; but he has not the right wantonly and needlessly, and out of the ordinary course in such cases, and not in the service of his substantial interest and benefit in the use of his mill in a reasonable manner, to throw such waste, or permit it to go into the stream, to the injury of inferior heritors. Jacobs v. Allard, 1 R. 331.

If the water of a stream becomes polluted by the emptying into it of city sewers, so that a riparian proprietor cannot use it in his business as he has been before accustomed to do, he cannot recover against the city for the pollution, so far as it is attributable to the plan of sewerage adopted by the city; but he can recover for it so far as it is attributable to the improper construction or unreasonable use of the sewers, or to the negligence or other fault of the city in the care or management of them. Merrifield v. City of Worcester, 14 R. 592.

Every owner of land through which water flows is entitled to receive the water uncorrupted in quality from riparian proprietors above him; and a court of equity will issue an injunction to prevent such corruption, upon satisfactory proof thereof. Richmond Mfg. Co. v. Atlantic De Laine Co., 14 R. 658.

The plaintiff purchased a tract of land in the coal region and erected a residence upon it. A leading inducement to the purchase was a pure mountain stream of water running through the land. The plaintiff constructed a pond for fish and ice upon it, and from it supplied a cistern, a ram and a tank in the attic of his house. Subsequently defendants opened a colliery on the stream two miles above, which corrupted the water and spoiled it for plaintiff's uses, killed fish and shrubbery, corroded the pipes, and compelled plaintiff's abandonment of the water. Held, that plaintiff had a right of action therefor, and that a nonsuit was erroneous. Sander-son v. Pennsylvania Coal Co., 27 R. 711.

In working a coal mine the defendant caused the debris to be deposited in a natural stream of water, and the same in the rainy season was carried and left on the plaintiff's land by the natural flow of the stream. Held, that the defendant was liable for the injury. Robinson v. Black Diamond Coal Co., 40 R. 118.

The defendant, proprietor of a slaughterhouse on a stream, had for eight years been in the habit of discharging the blood and offal into the stream. Other persons, proprietors of slaughterhouses, breweries, soap factories and the like, also discharged the refuse of their establishments in like manner. The effect was to damage the plaintiff, proprietor of a flour-mill which had been for thirty years established lower down the stream, by rendering the water offensive, tainting the air, and injuring the health of his operatives. Held, that the defendant should be enjoined. Woodyear v. Schaefer, 40 R. 419.

16. Subterranean watercourses; springs, wells, etc. — 1. In general. * — Prior occupancy of water percolating in the earth gives no exclusive right as against owners of adjacent land. Roath v. Driscoll, 52 D. 352.

In the enjoyment of one's land he may cut drains, or mine, or quarry, though in so doing he interferes with the flowage of water in hidden, unknown, underground channels. Haldeman v. Bruckhart, 84 D. 511.

A land-owner must not maliciously or negligently divert even an unknown subterranean stream, to the damage of a lower proprietor. Ib.

The inferior proprietor may have rights in known and well-defined subterranean streams which the courts will protect, and he may invoke the same rules in insisting upon their uninterrupted flow as exist in the cases of watercourses upon the surface. Ib.

Waters percolating in the soil belong to the owner of the freehold, and he may use them as he chooses, free from any usufructuary rights in others. Hanson v. McCue, 10 R. 299; Wilson v. City of New Bedford, 11 R. 352.

Where subterranean water emerges, and afterward sinks and re-emerges, if its entire exact course can be traced, the proprietor of the land at the latter point will be protected against a diversion of the water. Saddler v. Lee, 42 R. 62.

Where subterranean water flows in a distinct channel, an adjoining owner of land has no greater right to divert it than if it were on the surface of the earth. Burroughs v. Saterlee, 56 R. 350.

2. Wells. — Water standing or percolating in the soil is part of it, constituting one of the natural advantages of the land, which each owner is entitled to use as fully and freely as he can by sinking wells. Roath v. Driscoll, 52 D. 352.

Defendant digging a reservoir on his land, which lowers water in plaintiff's well, previously made on adjoining land, so that it cannot be used, there being no stream of water running into or from either excavation, and it not appearing whether the diminution of water in the plaintiff's well is produced by cutting off or diverting subterranean supplies, or by draining water from it, cannot be enjoined, there being no evidence of improper motive in the defendant's proceedings. Ib.

* See note on percolating and subterranean waters, 64 D. 727-730.

Draining a well or subterranean spring of another, caused by an excavation made by a person upon his own land, is damnum absque injuria, for which no action lies. New Albany etc. R. R. Co. v. Peterson, 77 D. 60.

A land-owner dug a well for the use of his family and stock, thereby preventing the water from reaching, by percolation or underground currents, the spring or open running stream of an adjoining owner. Held, that this was not actionable. Village of Delhi v. Youmans, 6 R. 100. S. P., Hougan v. Milwaukee etc. R. R. Co., 14 R. 502; Chase v. Silverstone, 16 R. 419; Phelps v. Nowlen, 28 R. 93.

3. Springs.—A defined subterranean flow of water amounting to a regular and constant stream cannot be diverted or destroyed by the owner of land above, through which it flows, to the injury of the owner of the land below, on which it issues in the form of a spring. Wheatley v. Baugh, 64 D. 721.

The destruction of a spring depending for its supply on percolation from the land above, by use of the land above for mining and other lawful purposes, will not render the owner liable in damages to the owner of the lower land whose spring is destroyed, unless the injury was occasioned by malice or negligence. Ib.

Where one by unnecessary excavations upon his own lands, without interfering with any known watercourses, withdraws water from his neighbor's spring or well by percolation, he is liable for the injury, if his acts are in derogation of a grant between the parties, or in violation of a covenant contained therein. Johnston Cheese Mfg. Co. v. Veghte, 25 R. 125.

One may not divert a spring on his land to the injury of a prior appropriator to whom the water naturally comes through a creek by percolation from the spring. Strait v. Brown, 40 R. 497.

One who accepts a deed with a reservation of the right to draw water from a spring, and afterward, for the sole purpose of cutting off the water percolating to the spring, digs a well on the land so conveyed, is liable to his grantor for the consequent injury. Chesley v. King, 43 R. 569.

Defendant was the owner of a spring supplied by percolation only and having no natural channel or outlet. There was an artificial channel which had for fifteen years conducted the water to plaintiff's land below. In an action to restrain defendant from digging on his own land so as to divert the sources of the spring, — held, that plaintiff had no such interest in the spring as would support the action, and that the user would not support the presumption of a grant of an easement. Hanson v. McCue, 10 R. 299.

A purchased land subject to the reservation of the right in B to conduct water from a spring thereon to his adjoining land. A in good faith dug a well on his own land, some forty feet from the spring, and the subterranean supply of the spring was thereby cut off. Held, that A should not be restrained. Lybe's Appeal, 51 R. 542.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

1. Power of congress to fix standard. — The grant in the federal constitution of power to congress to regulate weights and measures does not extinguish the right of the states to deal with the same subject until congress shall have exercised its power in regard thereto. Weaver v. Fegely, 70 D. 151; Harris v. Rutledge, 87 D. 441.

2. Effect of statutory provisions. — A statute regulating weights and measures binds the parties to contracts, and local customs fixing different weights or measures cannot be set up unless mentioned in the contract. Harris v. Rutledge, 87 D. 441.

A contract for masonry at a specified price per perch will be construed according to the statute defining the number of cubic feet in a perch, in the absence of any expression to the contrary; no implied contract to the contrary is competent, and if both parties contemplated a perch of a different number of feet, then the contract must be corrected in a court of equity. Ib.

3. What is a "ton." — Two thousand pounds avoirdupois weight constitute a ton in Pennsylvania. Evans v. Meyers, 25 Pa. St. 114; Weaver v. Fegely, 70 D. 151.

Powers of cities respecting, see MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS, 36.

Right to erect, see also RIPARIAN RIGHTS, 8.

1. Nature of wharves and property therein. — A wharf is private property when built by individuals. When built by a city under the general law, it is under the jurisdiction and control of the city authorities. Jeffersonville v. Louisville Ferry Co., 89 D. 495.

Flats pass by a conveyance of a wharf, both as appurtenant and as parcel, under the Massachusetts colony ordinance, where they are described as bounding on an arm of the sea and extend from the upland below high-water mark. Ashby v. Eastern R. R. Co., 38 D. 426.

2. Right to erect wharves. — A third person has no right to erect a wharf on the land below high-water mark on a tide-water stream, or on a creek emptying into it, without the permission of the owner of the adjacent fast land. Ball v. Slack, 30 D. 278.

The legislature may authorize the erection of wharves, and reclamation of land from water, for the purpose of encouraging navigation and commerce, although the effect is to confer privileges and advantages wholly private and exclusive in their character. Phipps v. State, 85 D. 654.

The right to erect a wharf is founded either in the ownership of the soil or the right of eminent domain. Jeffersonville v. Louisville Ferry Co., 89 D. 495.

The right to build and maintain a wharf out to a point in the stream where it is practicably navigable, or even beyond that point, provided it does not obstruct navigation, is a well-established incident to riparian ownership. Bainbridge v. Sherlock, 95 D. 644.

The legislature may forbid the owner of land on the bank of a navigable non-tidal river to build any wharf, pier or bulkhead between high and low-water marks, without the consent of the council of the town or city, and he may be enjoined from doing so. Ravenswood v. Flemings, 46 R. 485.

3. Rights of wharfingers, generally. — A wharf extended below low water gives no right of possession to any adjacent land under water not actually covered by the wharf, nor any right to the exclusive use of the open space at its side. The only right of the wharf-owner over the adjacent water is that which he has in common with all others, of mooring vessels upon it, or passing and repassing with boats and vessels engaged in navigation. Gray v. Bartlett, 32 D. 208.

The owner of flats, covering the whole thereof with a wharf, does not thereby make such a claim of right to use the land of a coterminous proprietor to lay vessels upon, as will ripen into a prescriptive right to so use such land, although the adjacent proprietor acquiesces in the maintenance of the wharf. Ib.

The right to use reasonably the water space in front of a wharf for the purpose of mooring vessels landing thereat is an incident to its ownership. This space, when not actually occupied by boats, may be freely traversed by the public engaged in navigating the stream, but it cannot be used as against the wharf proprietor, and without his consent, as mooring-ground for vessels. Bainbridge v. Sherlock, 95 D. 644.

4. Right to wharfage, and how enforced. — The taking of wharfage or toll on navigable streams is a franchise subject to the regulation of the legislature, and not lawfully exercisable without its permission. Lansing v. Smith, 21 D. 89.

Wharfage exacted of steamboats and vessels by the owner of the soil for the use of it is not a tonnage duty, repugnant to the federal constitution. O'Conley v. City of Natchez, 40 D. 87.

The right to collect wharfage and dockage is not within the California Revenue Act of 1851, and the naked right cannot be assessed eo nomine and made liable. De Witt v. Hays, 56 D. 352.

The right to collect wharfage or dockage is a franchise or incorporeal hereditament, an uncertain profit issuing out of realty, and is neither real estate nor personal property. Ib.

A wharfinger has no claim against the owner of goods for wharfage accruing after the owner has sold the goods, given the wharfinger notice thereof, and tendered him the wharfage due. Wooster v. Blossom, 72 D. 549.

Notice to a wharfinger of the sale of goods, to terminate the vendor's liability for future wharfage, may be given either orally or by a delivery order. Ib.

A wharfinger, like a common carrier, may make what contract he pleases as to his compensation. Southern S. Co. v. Sparks, 75 D. 793.

Where a wharfinger specifies his rates of charges, and gives notice to a customer in advance, and the latter afterwards makes use of the wharf, he thereby assents to the proposed charges, and cannot refuse to pay them on the ground that they are more than is reasonable or customary; and the same rule applies in the case of tavern-keepers and warehousemen. Ib.

A state statute giving a remedy for claims for wharfage by proceedings in rem is void. Brookman v. Hammill, 3 R. 731.

5. Lien for wharfage. — A wharfinger has a double remedy for his wharfage: a lien on the article and a claim against the owner personally. Wooster v. Blossom, 72 D. 549.

6. Liabilities of wharfingers, generally. — A wharfinger is one who keeps a wharf for the purpose of receiving goods for hire. Rodgers v. Stophel, 72 D. 775.

Wharfingers are liable for want of ordinary diligence only, and not as common carriers. Blin v. Mayo, 33 D. 175; Cox v. O'Riley, 58 D. 633; Rodgers v. Stophel, 72 D. 775.

To render a wharfinger liable, delivery to him must be proved, and a charge for wharfage, if made from the shipping list and not from inspection of the goods, is not sufficient evidence to prove that fact. Blin v. Mayo, 83 D. 175.

Mere delivery of goods at the wharf is not necessarily a delivery to a wharf-owner as a wharfinger, and evidence of usage is admissible to show when goods landed at a wharf are to be considered as in the custody of the wharfinger. Ib.

In an action against a wharfinger for the value of goods received by him, and which he failed to deliver to the consignee, he must prove the property to have been lost, or to have passed out of his possession, in order to have the court determine whether it had been so lost for the want of reasonable care. Cox v. O'Riley, 58 D. 633.

Requesting "a lad," who does not appear to be the agent of the consignee, to notify said consignee that a box was at the wharf for him, or proof that a rumor of such fact had reached said consignee, will not excuse a wharfinger from his neglect to give direct and reasonably prompt notice thereof. Ib.

A wharfinger's responsibility begins when goods are delivered on his wharf, and he has received them as wharfinger, either expressly or by implication. Rodgers v. Stopfel, 72 D. 775.

Whether a party is a wharfinger or not is a question for the jury. Ib.

7. — as regards safety, repairs, etc. — The lessee of a private wharf is liable for injury to a vessel which he takes to his wharf, there to be loaded by him with his cargo, occasioned while he was loading the vessel, without fault on the part of the owners, and through the insufficiency of the wharf. Barrett v. Black, 96 D. 497.

The owner of a wharf is liable for an injury to a vessel lawfully using it, by an obstruction in the river bottom adjoining it, known to him but not to the master of the vessel. Barber v. Abendroth, 55 R. 821.

A municipal ordinance required owners of wharves to maintain cap-logs. Owing to the absence of a cap-log on the defendant's wharf the plaintiff, acquainted with the premises, sustained injury. Evidence was offered by the defendant to show that cap-logs would have interfered with the loading of vessels in the course of their business. This was rejected. Held, error. Also, held, that no liability was raised by the mere non-compliance with the ordinance. Philadelphia etc. R. R. Co. v. Ervin, 33 R. 726.

A customs officer, searching for smugglers at a wharf where foreign vessels discharged, having no lantern, fell into the water through an opening left unguarded and unlighted in the wharf by the owner, and was injured. Held, that he could maintain an action therefor. Low v. Grand Trunk R'y Co., 39 R. 331.

8. Rights of persons using wharves. — Vessels whose cargoes are to be discharged at the same dock must take their turn in the order of their arrival; and the owner of such dock is not bound to make provision for an unexpected and accidental accumulation of vessels. Wordin v. Bemis, 85 D. 255.

A navigator who lawfully lands at a regular wharf is not justified by any public right in the river or stream in so mooring his boat that its side and stern will be carried against or lie along the wharf of an adjoining wharf-owner. Bainbridge v. Sherlock, 95 D. 644.

I. TESTAMENTARY CAPACITY, AND HOW EXERCISED.

1. General Principles.

1. General nature of a will. — The word "legacy" is often used in a will in relation to real as well as personal property, and its construction should be governed by the intention of the testator. Popularly the word is applied to land as well as to money; and courts should construe words according to their meaning in common parlance. Holmes v. Mitchell, 5 D. 527.

There is no such a thing known as a "voidable" will. McGee v. Porter, 55 D. 129.

One may dispose of his property by will in any manner whatever, whether he institutes an heir or only names legatees. Ehrenberg's Succession, 99 D. 729.

2. What will be deemed to be a will.

— 1. In general. — An instrument is a will, whatever its form, if the intention of the maker to dispose of his estate after death be sufficiently manifested, and this intention be lawful in itself and the writing have the statutory formalities. Babb v. Harrison, 70 D. 203.

A paper duly signed and attested is a will entitled to probate, which declares that it is the maker's last will and desire respecting his property, and that he has made a previous will which is contrary to his present wishes, but which is now out of his possession, so that he cannot destroy it; revokes all former wills, and leaves the distribution of his property under the laws of the state. Lucas v. Parsons, 71 D. 147.

A will disposing of property according to the laws of distribution is valid in Georgia, though not in England, and the heirs take under the will, and not by descent. Ib.

A will may be made on distinct papers, if they are connected by their internal sense, or by a coherence or adaptation of parts. Wikoff's Appeal, 53 D. 597.

To make a paper the last will and testament of a decedent at the time it is written, it must appear that such person possessed the animus testandi at that time. Booster v. Rogers, 52 D. 680.

A paper may be made the last will and testament by adoption, although not such at the time it is written. Ib.

A paper intended as a memorandum may be made a will by act of God, happening when the scrivener has not completed the formal will from the memorandum, the intention of the testator having continued until the act of God prevented the execution of the instrument. Nor is an immediate or sudden death necessary if the jury are satisfied from the evidence that the intention was unchanged respecting the provisions of the will. Ib.

The remaining provisions of a will are not deprived of their testamentary character, nor the instrument rendered inadmissible to probate, from the fact that some of its provisions may have had the force of a contract, and may have become operative during the life-time of the testatrix. Taylor v. Kelly, 68 D. 150.

Notes made by a testator, payable at his death, folded up with his will, referred to and clearly identified therein, and remaining in his possession at his death, are a part of the will. Fickle v. Snepp, 49 R. 449.

A gift of land, to take effect after the death of the donor, has all the properties of a will. Singleton v. Bremar, 17 D. 699.

A decedent wrote and signed on the back of a business letter addressed to a man and his wife the following, addressed to the wife: "After my death you are to have $40,000; this you are to have, will or no will; take care of this until my death." Held, a valid testamentary gift of personalty. Byers v. Hoppe, 48 R. 89.

Where the payee of a note wrote upon the back, "If I am not living at the time this note is paid, I order the contents to be paid to A. H.," and, having signed it, died before the note was paid, — held, that the indorsement was testamentary, and entitled to probate as a will. Hunt v. Hunt, 17 D. 438.

Instrument in form, substantially, "I, A, out of my love for my sister B, do agree to make her my heir if she outlives me; and I, B, out of my love for my sister A, do agree to make her my heir if she outlives me," if properly attested and otherwise regular in form, is a will, and parol evidence to establish it as a will is admissible. Evans v. Smith, 73 D. 751.

2. *Whether an instrument is a will or a deed.—An instrument in the form of a deed is a will, where the property that it purports to convey is an undivided interest in that of which the grantor shall die seized. Watkins v. Dean, 31 D. 583.

Whether an instrument is a deed or a will depends mainly upon the intention of the maker; whether he intended it to vest title before his death or after death. Wall v. Wall, 64 D. 147.

An instrument may be a will though in the form of a deed if it is revocable at pleasure, not to take effect until the death of the maker, and properly attested and otherwise regular in form. Evans v. Smith, 73 D. 751.

The rule of construction for determining whether an instrument is a will or a contract is, that if it passes a present interest, although the right to its possession and enjoyment may not accrue till some future time, it is a deed or contract; but if the instrument does not pass an interest or right till the death of the maker, it is a will or testamentary paper. Burlington University v. Barrett, 92 D. 376.

An instrument may be partly a deed and partly testamentary. Ib.

In determining whether an instrument is a testament or a contract, courts do not allow the use of language peculiar to either class of instruments, nor even the belief of the maker as to the character of the instrument, to control inflexibly their construction of it; but giving due weight to these circumstances, courts look further, and weighing all the language as well as facts and circumstances surrounding the parties and attending the execution of the instrument, give to it such construction as will effectuate the manifest intention of the maker. Ib.

An instrument in the form of a deed, which conveys all the property that the maker "may die possessed of," is a will, and is only admissible in evidence after due probate. Brewer v. Baxter, 5 R. 530.

An instrument of which the following is a copy was held to be a will, and not a deed, "Due at my death to Haney Johnson the sum of two thousand five hundred dollars, from the general fund of my estate, as a gift. The condition of the above bond or obligation is such that whereas, for the fidelity and obedience, as well as the natural love and affection that I have for my daughter, Haney Johnson, I donate, in the above manner, what I design for her at my death." Duly dated, attested and signed. Johnson v. Yancey, 65 D. 646.

3. What will not be so deemed.—A paper purporting to be a schedule of advancements made by the alleged testator to some of his children does not form part of the will, and can have no effect on the question of admitting the instrument to probate, or the proof of its execution. Grabill v. Barr, 47 D. 418.

A memorandum of advancements made by a deceased, no matter how strictly kept or clearly proved, nor his dying words spoken in the presence of all his family, no matter how just, unless it can be proved as a will, can receive no notice from the courts. Sims v. Sims, 99 D. 450.

Memoranda of advancements kept by deceased are evidence of the fact of advancement, and prima facie evidence of its value, but they are in no sense a will. Ib.

An instrument passing property in a donor's life-time, although of alleged testamentary character, being not absolutely a will, must be a deed, for there is no middle ground. Hileman v. Bouslaugh, 53 D. 474.

An ante-nuptial agreement is not a testamentary paper, forms no part of a will, and should not be admitted to probate. Michael v. Baker, 71 D. 593.

4. *Testamentary capacity.—1. In general.—To make a valid will, the testator must be of sound and disposing mind and memory, capable of disposing of his property with sense and judgment with respect to the condition and value of the property and the relative claims of the objects of his bounty. Clark v. Fisher, 19 D. 402; Comstock v. Hadlyme Ec. Soc., 20 D. 100; Converse v. Converse, 52 D. 58; Kirkwood v. Gordon, 62 D. 418.

A valid will may be executed by any one having the soundness and strength of mind necessary to make a contract. Chandler v. Barrett, 99 D. 701; Davis v. Calvert, 25 D. 282. Although at the time of executing it he was incapable of transacting business generally. Kinne v. Kinne, 21 D. 732; Terry v. Buffington, 56 D. 423; St. Leger's Appeal, 91 D. 735. However inferior his capacity or weak his understanding, either from natural or adventitious causes. Tomkins v. Tomkins, 19 D. 656.

The will itself is the strongest proof of a testatrix's capacity when made in conformity to a fixed determination, entertained and expressed for years. Couch v. Couch, 42 D. 602.

The reasonableness of a will is a circumstance in favor of the testator's capacity, where there is doubt as to such capacity. Tomkins v. Tomkins, 19 D. 656.

The capacity of a testator at the time of making his will is the sole question to be determined in deciding upon the validity of the will on that ground. Kinne v. Kinne, 21 D. 732; Davis v. Calvert, 25 D. 282.

Evidence of the testator's mental and physical condition, before and after executing the will, is admissible for the purpose of throwing light on his state of mind at the time of execution. Davis v. Calvert, 25 D. 282.

* Instances of instruments construed to be wills, see note, 38 R. 621, 622.

The ability to recollect minutely instructions given the day before is wholly inconsistent with the imbecility and alienation of mind that incapacitates from making a will. Tomkins v. Tomkins, 19 D. 656.

2. Of persons of unsound mind. — A will executed in a lucid interval by one who was before and afterwards a confirmed lunatic is valid. Wright v. Lewis, 55 D. 714.

Partial insanity does not disqualify from making a will; a will made in a lucid interval by a person habitually insane is valid, and where there is nothing unreasonable on the face of the will of one habitually insane, it will be presumed to have been made in a lucid interval. Kingsbury v. Whitaker, 36 R. 278.

Partial unsoundness of mind not affecting the general faculties, and not operating on the mind of a testator, in regard to testamentary disposition, is not sufficient to render him incapable of disposing of his property by will. Pidcock v. Potter, 8 R. 181.

A mere glimmering of reason is sufficient to sustain a will in Georgia if the testator comprehends the contents of his will, the nature of the estate he is conveying, the relations and terms upon which he stands toward his family, and his own situation and circumstances. Terry v. Buffington, 56 D. 423.

A person may be capable of disposing by will, and yet incapable to make a contract or to manage his estate. Potts v. House, 50 D. 329. For to make a contract, more than passive memory must exist; there must be sufficient active memory to collect particulars of business to be transacted and retain them until their relations are perceived, and to form some rational judgment concerning them. Converse v. Converse, 52 D. 58.

3. Of very aged persons. — A testator's extreme old age is not of itself sufficient to render him incompetent to make a will. Kirkwood v. Gordon, 62 D. 418; if sufficient intelligence remain. Higgins v. Carlton, 92 D. 666.

Great age, bodily infirmity and impaired mind do not vitiate a will made by one possessing a recollection of the property to be bequeathed and the manner of its disposition. It is not necessary that the memory should be perfect and the mind unimpaired. Taylor v. Kelly, 68 D. 150.

Evidence of the conduct of an aged testator after making his will, and while he was gradually failing, is entitled to little weight. Kinne v. Kinne, 21 D. 732.

4. Of drunkards. — The habitual drunkard is presumed competent when sober to make a will or a valid gift, unless it appears that intemperance has produced a settled derangement of the faculties. Gardner v. Gardner, 34 D. 340.

A dissipated man, habitually indulging in strong drink may, nevertheless, make a will, unless some fixed mental disease has supervened, or his present intoxication is such as to render him not master of himself, and therefore irresponsible for his acts. Peck v. Cary, 84 D. 220.

A will made by one then under the influence of intoxicating liquors, is not, for that reason void; unless he was so excited by the liquor as to disorder his faculties and pervert his judgment. Under a slight degree of excitement from liquor, the memory and understanding may remain correct. Ib.

5. *Of believers in spiritualism. — A belief in spiritualism does not of itself incapacitate to make a valid will. Will of Smith, 38 R. 756. Even where the testatrix acted under supposed instructions from the spirit of her deceased brother, unless actual unsoundness of mind is found. Brown v. Ward, 36 R. 422.

6. Of blind persons. — A blind man may make a will, if other requisite perceptive faculties remain, and he be of sound mind. Ray v. Hill, 49 D. 647.

7. Of felons. — Under the common law, all the property of a felon after conviction was forfeited to the state, but by the constitution of Kentucky such forfeiture is only for the life of the offender; and therefore a convicted felon may dispose by will of all the reversionary interest in his property. Rankin v. Rankin, 17 D. 161.

5 Testamentary capacity of married women.† — A feme covert cannot devise real estate to her husband. Adams v. Kellog, 1 D. 13.

A married woman may devise lands by an instrument in the nature of a will when they are placed in the hands of trustees subject to her disposal by will. Cutter v. Butler, 57 D. 330.

A married woman may devise real estate under the New Hampshire statute, by a will proved in the probate court, and the power thus given extends to all lands, tenements, and hereditaments, and all rights thereto and interests therein, whether legal or equitable. Ib.

A married woman may, in equity, bequeath like a feme sole whatever property she may be entitled to hold in her own right and to her own separate use, and this is enacted by a New Hampshire statute under which no trustee is necessary; but the husband can convey to his wife only through the medium of a trustee, and the equitable estate so conveyed would be equally at the disposition of the wife by her will. Ib.

A married woman who purchases real estate with her separate earnings, with the consent of her husband, may dispose of the same by will, whether he give his consent or not, and her disposition of it is not affected by the fact that after her death the husband procures a change in the title to the land into his name, especially where he gave his consent to the making of the will at the time it was made. Cavanaugh v. Ainchbacker, 91 D. 778.

6. What is a disposing mind and memory. — The terms "sound and disposing mind and memory" stand opposed not only to idiocy and lunacy, but to all derangement of mind occasioned by melancholy, grief, sorrow, misfortune, sickness or disease; but every discomposure of the mind by these causes will not render one incapable of making a will; it must be such a discomposure as deprives him of the rational faculties common to man. Den v. Johnson, 8 D. 610.

7. Monomania as evidence of incapacity. — The partial insanity of a testator may invalidate a will which is proved to have been the direct result of such insanity. But where the facts of the case are sufficient to account for the motives of the testator in making the disposition of his property that he does, there is no reason for resorting to the explanation of monomania or any other form of insanity. Trumbull v. Gibbons, 51 D. 253.

8. What property may pass by will, generally. — The English statutes of wills were originally in force in Pennsylvania. Girard v. Philadelphia, 26 D. 145.

The disposable property of a testator is limited in Louisiana, under the rule of the civil law adopted in that state, in favor of his legitimate descendants or surviving parents, who are termed his forced heirs, so as to leave them a certain portion varying, according to their number, in a certain fixed ratio, and a bequest impairing that portion is, to that extent, inoperative. Montgomery v. Millikin, 43 D. 507.

A bequest exceeding the disposable property of a testator will be reduced in Louisiana, within the limits of his disposable estate, but is valid to that extent, if there is no disability in the legatee. Ib.

A bequest by a husband to a second wife in Louisiana is limited by law, if the testator has children by a former marriage still living, and she can take no more than a child's share, and in no case can a bequest to her exceed the usufruct of one-fifth of the estate. Ib.

A husband's bequest to a second wife exceeding the legal limit is valid in Louisiana to the extent to which she may lawfully take, and is void only as to the excess. Ib.

The usufruct and absolute property are reciprocally convertible under the Louisiana law, and the rule of conversion is that the usufruct of property to a certain amount is equal to one-half the value in absolute property. Ib.

A husband's bequest to a second wife of a certain sum in money will be computed as equal in value to the usufruct of double that sum under the Louisiana law; and if that is more than one-fifth of the estate, it will be reduced to that sum, otherwise it is valid for the whole sum bequeathed. Ib.

Where P. made an assignment of personality in trust, for the benefit of his minor children, and delivered the same to the trustee, and afterwards made his will, giving his wife one-third of his personal property and her dower in his real estate, — held, that testator's wife had no right to share in the property mentioned in the trust. Sanborn v. Goodhue, 59 D. 398.

9. Real property. — A will of "all I possess, indoors and outdoors," is sufficient to pass real estate. Tolar v. Tolar, 14 D. 575.

A homestead may be disposed of by will when the testator left no widow and had not lived upon the land for five or six years before his death. Lorieux v. Keller, 68 D. 696.

10. After-acquired property. — Real estate acquired subsequent to the execution of the will is not affected thereby; so held where the testator at the time of the execution of his will held a mortgage and subsequently acquired the fee to the land and canceled the mortgage. Ballard v. Carter, 16 D. 377.

All estate, right, or interest in lands acquired by a testator after making his will, and of which he died seised or possessed, passes in like manner as if owned by him at the making of the will, if such appears to be his intention. Wynne v. Wynne, 58 D. 66.

Lands acquired after the making of a will do not pass thereby, under the South Carolina act of 1791, unless there has been a subsequent republication of the will, but they descend to the heir-at-law. Landrum v. Hatcher, 70 D. 237.

A devise of all the testator's real estate to S., and the residue of his "personal estate and possessions of whatever kind or name," does not cover land in another place, many years subsequently descending to the testator. Blaisdell v. Hight, 31 R. 278.

11. Joint wills.* — A will executed jointly by two persons is valid, where it simply professes to dispose of all the estate of the one who should first die to the survivor. Lewis v. Scofield, 68 D. 404.

An instrument by which a husband and wife jointly attempt to make a testamentary disposition of the property of both, to treat it as a joint fund, jointly devising the real property of the wife, and jointly giving legacies out of the personalty of both, cannot be admitted to probate as the will of either, or of both. Such an instrument is in its nature irrevocable and contravenes the policy of the law. Walker v. Walker, 82 D. 474.

A joint will is unknown to the testamentary law of this country. Ib.

In an instrument made by a husband and wife as a joint will, in which some of the bequests are several, and some joint, the former cannot be executed and the latter rejected, as the several provisions may have been influenced by the joint, and the intention of the testator would be thus defeated. Ib.

Tenants in common of land, owning personal property in severalty, may make a joint will disposing of all their property severably, which will take effect on the death of all. Bette v. Harper, 48 R. 477.

A writing, executed by two persons, purporting to be a will, whereby, in consideration of mutual friendship, they mutually promise that, in the event of the death of either, the survivor shall pay the expenses of sickness and burial, and shall enter into the possession of the estate of the other, is not a compact, but a will, revocable by either, and is rendered inoperative by a subsequent separate will of either. Schumaker v. Schmidt, 4 R. 135.

A joint will, conditioned to take effect on the death of both, is invalid. Hershy v. Clark, 37 R. 1.

An agreement between two savings-bank depositors, that the survivor shall have the other's deposit, not being executed according to the statute of wills and each retaining control during his life, is invalid. Towle v. Wood, 49 R. 326.

12. Olographic wills.*—An olographic will commenced, "I, J. W., of, etc., give and bequeath [my estate] in the following manner." The property was then disposed of, and the will concluded: "In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, this day of , 1841. Signed and acknowledged in presence of." There was no signature of testator nor witness' name at the bottom, nor were the blanks filled. Held, not well executed. Waller v. Waller, 42 D. 564.

The signature of the testator must appear to have been regarded as a signature, and the instrument complete, and the paper itself must show it. Ib.

An undated subsequent clause added to an olographic will which appears consistent and connected will be presumed to have been written at the same time as the original will. Both will be construed as the will of the testator, in the absence of proof to the contrary. Lagrange v. Merle, 52 D. 589.

A script may be proved as an olographic will, though attested by subscribing witnesses. Brown v. Beaver, 67 D. 255.

An instrument will be established as an olograph will, notwithstanding the fact that it has upon it an attestation clause unwitnessed. Hill v. Bell, 93 D. 583.

The placing of an olograph by a testator among his valuable papers and effects satisfies the requirements of the statute on the matter of deposit. Ib.

An instrument entirely written, dated and signed by the testator is clothed with all the formalities of law required to constitute a valid olographic will. Ehrenberg's Succession, 99 D. 729.

A will consisting in a printed form with the blanks filled in the testator's handwriting is not an olographic will, and no part of it can stand. Estate of Rand, 44 R. 555.

A document as follows, being written, signed and dated entirely by the hand of the testator, is valid as his olographic will or codicil: "$100,000. New Orleans, January 25, 1848. Four years from and after my death, I hereby authorize and direct (and will) my executors to pay unto Francis Pena one hundred thousand dollars. John McDonogh." Pena v. New Orleans and Baltimore, 71 D. 506.

13. Nuncupative wills.*—A nuncupative will is unwritten; and a signed writing intended as a will, but not duly attested, cannot be set up as a nuncupative will. Stamper v. Hooks, 68 D. 511.

Words spoken, to constitute a nuncupative will, must have been uttered by a person in extremis, who had at the time of uttering such words a present intent to make them his will, which intent should be distinctly indicated by calling upon some person present to take notice that he intended them as his will, or by doing some act from which it will clearly appear that the words were intended to be testamentary. Winn v. Bob, 23 D. 258. S. P., Sykes v. Sykes, 20 D. 40; Prince v. Hazleton, 11 D. 307. If one has for a long time suffered from pulmonary consumption, and lives for nine days after the alleged nuncupation, it cannot be admitted to probate as his will. Yarnall's Will, 26 D. 115.

Nuncupative wills are tolerated but not favored, and their admission to probate must be preceded by proof of strict compliance with the statute in every particular. Ib.

It is necessary to the validity of a nuncupative will that the testamentary capacity of the deceased, and the animus testandi at the time of the alleged nuncupation, appear by the clearest and most indisputable testimony. Dorsey v. Sheppard, 37 D. 77.

* See note on Olographic Wills, 52 D. 591-593.

* Nuncupative will, what constitutes, see notes, 81 D. 230, 231; 20 D. 44-48.

The testamentary capacity of the maker of a nuncupative will, and the animus testandi, must be shown by clear and indisputable evidence. Yarnall's Will, 26 D. 115.

An instrument propounded as a nuncupative will must be clearly shown to contain the true substance and import of the alleged nuncupation. Ib.

Two witnesses to a nuncupative will are required, who must both be present at the making thereof, and hear the testator call both, or on two or more persons then present, to remember that such is his will. Ib.

The rogatio testium of a nuncupative will need not be in any set or particular form of words. Ib.

A testator in a nuncupative will must request those present, by signs or words, to bear witness that such is his will, in order to render it valid under the Illinois statutes. Arnett v. Arnett, 81 D. 227.

A nuncupative will made by interrogatories requires stricter proof of spontaneity and volition than would be required in an ordinary case. Dorsey v. Sheppard, 37 D. 77.

The probate of a nuncupative will made by interrogatories will be refused where facts leave a doubt as to the mental capacity of the testator, and there is not sufficient proof of spontaneity and of the animus testandi. Ib.

An imperfect, written will may have the effect of a nuncupative will, if its non-completion in legal form resulted from the act of God, or from any cause other than an actual intention to abandon it or postpone its consummation. Offutt v. Offutt, 38 D. 183.

The failure of the testator to dispose of his whole estate as he intended, leaving a portion undivided, contrary to his declared purpose, will not prevent his written will to that extent from having force and effect as a nuncupative will. Ib.

The statute of Tennessee (code, sec. 2165) concerning nuncupative wills, is sufficiently complied with, by decedent addressing himself to two witnesses, saying: "I wish to make a disposition of my effects." The language of the statute need not be used. Baker v. Dodson, 40 D. 650.

A nuncupative will executed before a notary and three witnesses is void, if one of the attesting witnesses did not understand the language in which the will was written sufficiently to comprehend what was said. Breaux v. Gallusseaux, 74 D. 430.

The testimony of a notary before whom a nuncupative will was made is not admissible to supply want of capacity in an attesting witness as to what was done. Ib.

A nuncupative will resting upon the testimony of the notary before whom it was executed and two attesting witnesses is void, and not in compliance with the law of Louisiana. Ib.

A nuncupative will must, under articles 1574 and 1575, civil code of Louisiana, be dictated by the testator; or in the absence of such dictation, he must present the instrument which he has caused to be written, and declare that it contains his last intentions. The word "dictation" is used in a technical sense, and means to pronounce orally what is destined to be written at the same time by another. Prendergast v. Prendergast, 79 D. 575.

In a case of a nuncupative will by private act, in Louisiana, nothing can be taken by implication. If the law requires a technical dictation in such a case, there must be a strict compliance. Nor would the court be justified in presuming a compliance. Ib.

A nuncupative will by a private act cannot be annulled on the ground that it was written in the presence of the witnesses. It will suffice to comply with some formality in their absence, a fortiori in their presence. The presence of witnesses is intended as a sanction to the proceedings, and cannot invalidate them in any contingency. Ib.

A nuncupative will by a private act is valid, where the testator caused his will to be written by one of the subscribing witnesses, and presented it to them as his last will, declaring that it contained his last intention. Ib.

Slaves cannot be the subject of testamentary disposition except as provided by statute in Kentucky, which precludes their passing by nuncupative will. Offutt v. Offutt, 38 D. 183.

Whether slaves can be emancipated by a nuncupative will under the provision of Va. Rev. Code, c. 111, sec. 53, quære? Winn v. Bob, 23 D. 258.

A bequest of money to buy a slave is not a bequest of a slave, and may be made by a nuncupative will. Sledd v. Carey, 52 D. 570.

B., being in extremis, requests R. to write his will, which he does at B.'s dictation, and B. attempts to sign it, but cannot, and requests R. to sign it for him. While R. is complying, B. swoons, and dies without further attempt to execute the will. Three witnesses are present and hear the bequests, and sign the will as witnesses. Held, a good nuncupative will. Phabe v. Boggess, 42 D. 543.

A statute provided that a nuncupative will must be made "in the time of the last sickness" of the testator. Where one in his last illness, believing it would probably result in death, but not without hope of recovery, executed his will as required by the statute, — held, not invalid, because he may have had time and opportunity to reduce it to writing. Harrington v. Stees, 25 R. 290.

14. Codicils. — An instrument valid as a will of personal property, when there is a prior valid will of real and personal property, may be admitted to probate to a limited extent as a codicil, but not so as to be a charge on the real estate. Marston v. Marston, 43 D. 611.

Proof of a codicil establishes a will, or such portions thereof as are not revoked by the codicil, when the codicil is written on the same paper as the will, or clearly refers to and identifies the will. Duncan v. Duncan, 76 D. 699.

2. Execution, Attestation, etc.

15. Necessity of execution.* — Where a will is finished with the exception of the attestation clause and the clause appointing an executor, and the draughtsman leaves and does not return till the next day, when the testator was mentally incapable of finishing it, and fills in these clauses himself, it will be admitted to probate as far as the personalty is concerned, it comprising within its scope all the objects of the testator's bounty, and the instrument showing that nothing in the nature of a deduction from or charge upon the bequests would have been added. Guthrie v. Owen, 36 D. 311.

Where legacies are to be made from the real and personal property in such a case, they will be made from the personalty as far as possible, though they will fail as to the realty. Ib.

To the validity of a will of personalty, it is only necessary that it be made by or according to the directions of the deceased, and be in writing. It is not necessary that it be witnessed, or written, or signed by the testator; if drawn up according to his directions and approved by him, it may operate as a valid will. Couch v. Couch, 42 D. 602.

A husband and wife each had a will drawn in favor of the other. After the husband's death it was found that each, by mistake, had signed the will of the other, to remedy which error the legislature passed a special act, authorizing the court to reform the will in case the mistake was proved. Held, that there was, in law, no will; that, at the death of her husband, his estate vested in his heirs; and that the subsequent legislation was invalid, the effect of it being to divest estates. Alter's Appeal, 5 R. 433.

16. What is a sufficient signing or execution.† — 1. In general. — It has never been determined that each of the several sheets of paper on which the will is written must be signed by the testator. Pearson v. Wightman, 12 D. 636.

Due execution of a will must be determined by the law in force when it was executed. Jauncey v. Thorne, 45 D. 424.

The will of a blind person, or of one so illiterate as to be unable to read or write, need not be read over to him at the time of its execution, in the presence of the subscribing witnesses, in order to render it valid. The validity of such an instrument is for the jury to determine, and depends upon the fact whether the testator intended it as his last will and testament. Clifton v. Murray, 50 D. 411.

A statute intended to operate on wills already executed and consummated by the death of the testator, as well as upon future wills, prescribing what shall be deemed a sufficient signing of a will, is, so far as it is retrospective, an exercise of judicial power, and therefore unconstitutional, and must be construed exclusively prospective. Greenough v. Greenough, 51 D. 567.

A statute confirming wills defectively executed does not stand on the same ground as a statute confirming defective conveyances, because the devisee is a volunteer. Ib.

A written sheet not having been signed by a testator, but connected by the sense and the dependence of it upon another sheet which has been properly signed and attested, will be considered as being a part of the will. Martin v. Hamlin, 53 D. 673.

A testator must know the contents of the will, but ordinarily the law will take his bare signature as proof of such knowledge. Hughes v. Meredith, 71 D. 127.

Where a writer of another's will takes a large benefit under it, the testator's knowledge of its contents must be shown by proof that it was read to or by him, or that he gave instructions for it, or by proof of some other fact or facts of equal force. Ib.

A will is valid, though not read to or by a testator, where it is written in his presence and according to his dictation, and executed in accordance with the statutes. Hess's Appeal, 82 D. 551.

A will may be valid although written in a language not understood by the testator. Will of Walter, 54 R. 640.

2. What signing is sufficient. — A subscription by the testator after the attestation clause is "at the end of the will," and valid. Younger v. Duffie, 46 R. 156.

A testator must subscribe a will at the end thereof in the presence of each witness attesting it, or must acknowledge to each witness that he has so subscribed it, to render it valid under the New York statute, but he may sign by making his mark, or another may subscribe his name in his presence and by his direction. Chaffee v. Baptist Missionary Conv., 40 D. 225.

The execution of a will, under the Pennsylvania statute, can only be made by the testator signing his name at the end thereof, unless the testator is prevented by the extremity of his last sickness, in which case his name may be signed by some person in his presence, and by his express direction, and in all cases such execution must be proved by the oaths of two or more competent witnesses. Signing by a mark is in no case sufficient. Grabill v. Barr, 47 D. 418.

The mark of a blind testator is equivalent to a signature, when through want of learning, or nervous debility, he is incapable of subscribing his name; and in affixing his mark, it is competent for some one to guide his hand. Ray v. Hill, 49 D. 647.

Where a will is signed by the request of the testator and in his presence, the subsequent addition by him of his mark to the signature so made is superfluous. And whether such mark is added before or after the witnesses subscribed the will is not material, where the whole transaction is one continuous uninterrupted act, conducted and completed within a few minutes, while all concerned in it continued present, and during the unbroken supervising attesting attention of the subscribing witnesses. Rosser v. Franklin, 52 D. 97.

A person who signs a testator's name to a will by direction of the testator must subscribe his own name as a witness to such will, and state that he subscribed testator's name at his request, in order to render the will valid. McGee v. Porter, 55 D. 129.

3. Necessity of signing in the presence of subscribing witnesses. — A will need not be signed by a testator in the presence of the attesting witnesses. It is sufficient that he acknowledge his signature, and request them to attest as witnesses, or that he merely declare to them that the paper is his will. Dewey v. Dewey, 35 D. 367; Webb v. Fleming, 76 D. 675.

The declaration by a testator before witnesses that the paper is his will, is equivalent to an actual signature in their presence; they need not see him write his name, nor even see the name after he has written it. Dewey v. Dewey, 35 D. 367.

A will need not be signed in the presence of the subscribing witnesses, under the statute of Charles II, provided it was in fact signed by the testator previously to his acknowledging and publishing it in the presence of all or each of them. Jauncey v. Thorne, 45 D. 424.

Where a testator puts his mark to a subscription of his name to his will in the presence of two or more subscribing witnesses, this is a sufficient signing thereof, within the meaning of the statute. Rosser v. Franklin, 52 D. 97.

A will is duly executed by a testator where he affixes his mark thereto by the assistance of one of the subscribing witnesses, by the request or with the assent of the testator, and on being asked if he acknowledges the same to be his mark, or words to that effect, assents, and being asked if he wishes the witnesses present to attest it as his last will and testament, assents, and the witnesses attest the same by subscribing their names thereto, by his request, in his presence, and in the presence of each other, provided such testator was at the time of sound and disposing mind, and mentally capable of executing a valid deed or contract. Higgins v. Carlton, 92 D. 686.

The testatrix's friend, S., said to her: "These gentlemen, F. and R., have come to witness the will." She bowed her head. The will was read to her by F. in an audible voice; and on being asked if she understood it, she bowed again. She then signed the will. The witnesses, F. and R., subscribed the will at a table in the room near the foot of the bed. She was so lying that she was obliged to see them, unless she shut her eyes or turned her head away. Held, a valid execution. Baldwin v. Baldwin, 59 R. 669.

17. What is not. — Where a testator exhibits a will to witnesses, already signed, and putting his finger on his name, acknowledges that it is his will, and requests them to attest it, but it is not shown that he signed the will in the presence of each of them, or acknowledged to them that he had so signed, or that another had done so for him, in his presence and by his direction, the will is invalid, although the attestation clause states that the will was signed in the presence of the witnesses. Chaffee v. Baptist Missionary Conv., 40 D. 225.

A testator must sign a will in presence of both witnesses, or acknowledge his signature in their presence, and if he neither signs nor acknowledges in the presence of one of them, it is fatal. Rutherford v. Rutherford, 43 D. 644.

The execution of a will, under the statute of April 8, 1833, can only be made by the testator signing the instrument by his own signature, if able so to do, or in case of inability, by some person, in his presence and by his express direction, signing his name for him. Signing by a mark is insufficient in any case, and so is the name of the testator, written by another, unless in accordance with the direction of the statute. Asay v. Hoover, 45 D. 713.

The intention of a testator must be gathered from the language of the will, and not from extrinsic evidence. Id.

If a negro interpreter, incapable by law of being sworn, is the only channel of communication between the testator and writer of the will, and there be no other evidence of the testator's knowledge of its contents, or his assent thereto, than that which is derived through this medium, the will cannot be executed; but if the will is written in the presence of the testator, in a language he understands, is read over to him, and his dictation and approval of the instrument are interpreted by the negro in his hearing, and in the hearing of others, and he signifies no dissent thereto, but is understood to express himself satisfied, the will may be established. Potts v. House, 50 D. 329.

See Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

A mark is not a signature at common law, or under the Pennsylvania statute of wills of 1833. Greenough v. Greenough, 51 D. 567.

The testator affixing a mark to his name, written by another without his direction, is not a sufficient signing of a will under a statute requiring the will to be signed by the testator, or "by some person in his presence and by his express direction." Ib.

It is not a sufficient signing of an olographic will for the testator to write his name at the commencement thereof, unless it appears affirmatively from something on the face of the paper that the testator meant it as his signature. Roy v. Roy, 84 D. 696; Ramsey v. Ramsey, 70 D. 438.

Where an otherwise complete olographic will is not signed, an indorsement on the back as follows, "Roy's will," that being the testator's name, is not a signature. Roy v. Roy, 84 D. 696.

18. Necessity of publication.—If the due subscribing and attesting of a will be proved, it need not be shown that the testator made the usual declaration that it was his last will and testament. Small v. Small, 16 D. 253.

The testator need not declare to witnesses, nor need they know, that the instrument which they attest at his request is his will. It is sufficient that he knows what the instrument is. No formal publication or declaration that it is his will is required. Osborn v. Cook, 59 D. 155.

A will purporting to dispose of both real and personal estate may be established as a valid testamentary disposition of the personality, although it may not have been so published as to constitute a legal disposition of the realty. Offutt v. Offutt, 38 D. 183.

An instrument is not a valid will when it does not appear from the testimony that the instrument was spoken of by any present as a will, or that its character was then mentioned, but that nothing was said about it. Gerrish v. Nason, 39 D. 589.

A publication of a will is necessary, under New York statute of 1830, to give it validity, and to constitute such publication there must be some communication by the testator to the witnesses at the time of signing or acknowledging the will, indicating an intention to give effect to the paper as the testator's will, but no particular form of words is necessary. Remsen v. Brinckerhoff, 37 D. 251.

19. What is a sufficient publication.—It is not necessary for the subscribing witnesses to see a testator sign his will, nor that he should acknowledge to them his signature thereto, or even that the instrument is his will. It is sufficient if he acknowledges, in their presence, that the act is his, with a knowledge of the contents of the instrument, and with the intention that it shall be the testamentary disposition of his property. Such acknowledgment is a ratification of the signature, whether made by himself, or by another in his presence and by his direction. Rosser v. Franklin, 52 D. 97.

The publication of a will may be made in any form of communication by testator to witnesses, whereby he makes known to them that he intends the instrument to take effect as his will. Coffin v. Coffin, 80 D. 235.

The publication of a will is sufficiently proved when the attesting clause is in proper form, and it appears from the evidence that the witnesses were called into a room where testator and the draughtsman of the will were; that the draughtsman stated that Robert (the testator) was going to sea, and was about making his will, and wished them to witness it, although the witnesses cannot remember that anything was said by the testator. Peck v. Cary, 84 D. 220.

The signing and acknowledging of a will by a testator in the presence of witnesses should be inferred when the attesting clause is in due form, and it is shown that the witnesses were called into the room where testator was to witness his will; that they all went to the table to witness it, and went away supposing they had done so; that the draughtsman of the will also considered that they had done so; that the testator left town, intending to go to sea, with the same impression; that the will was signed by the testator, and the attesting clause by the witnesses; and that all this was done in a brief period, and without any apparent interval. Ib.

Testator had his will written in the house; went out and called the two subscribing witnesses from a field; said he wanted them to come and sign a paper. They went into the house; the scrivener read over to them the attesting clause, the testator being present in the room, and after the reading the testator handed the pen to the witnesses, who signed the instrument. No words were spoken during this time. Held, a sufficient acknowledgment by testator that it was his will. Allison v. Allison, 92 D. 237.

The statute does not require that an acknowledgment that an instrument is a will be made in words, or by means of language; any act which indicates the same thing with unmistakable certainty will answer as well. Ib.

Where a will has been signed for the testator by another person, in his presence and by his express direction, in the absence of the attesting witnesses, the requisite acknowledgment of the fact by the testator in the hearing of the witnesses need not be in any particular form of words, nor any specified manner, but if the witnesses are made to understand by signs, motions, conduct or attending circumstances, that the testator acknowledges the signature as his, and the instrument as his will, it is sufficient; it is not necessary that the testator should acknowledge to the attesting witnesses that such signing was in pursuance of his previous express authority and in his presence; and the fact of such signing and of such authority may be shown by the acknowledgment to the witnesses, or by other competent testimony, or may be presumed from the facts and circumstances. Haynes v. Haynes, 31 R. 579.

20. What is not sufficient.—Where a person, who was old and infirm, had submitted to him an instrument in writing, which he signed, and which was attested by three subscribing witnesses at the same time, but neither the deceased nor the witnesses gave any intimation at the time that the paper so signed was a will, — held, that there was no publication of the will. Sweet v. Boardman, 2 D. 16.

A declaration that an instrument is the last will of the testator, made by a third person in his presence and in that of the witnesses, if sufficient in any case, must be distinct and unequivocal, and a declaration that the instrument is the testator's "will or agreement" is too indefinite. Rutherford v. Rutherford, 43 D. 644.

21. Republication.—An obliteration of an exception to a general clause in a will does not restore the operation of such clause without a republication, this being considered a new devise. Pringle v. McPherson, 3 D. 713.

The republication of a will is not essential where the testator erases the name of one of the executors and inserts another in its place. Wells v. Wells, 16 D. 150.

A will cannot dispose of real estate acquired after the date of its execution, however clearly expressed the intention of the testator, unless there is a republication of the will. Beall v. Schley, 41 D. 415.

A republication of a will by codicil is good, though the will be not present at the time. Witoff's Appeal, 53 D. 597.

A memorandum under the testator's signature does not invalidate a will on the ground that the statute prescribes the signature to be at the end of the will, when the will is afterwards republished by codicil. Ib.

A testator signing and publishing a codicil in the presence of witnesses republishes his will, and both together make but one will. Harvey v. Choteau, 55 D. 120.

An olographic or unattested will may be set up and republished by a properly attached codicil, although the latter is not physically annexed to the will. Ib.

A codicil draws a will down to its own date in the very terms of the will, and makes it operate as if it had been executed in those terms. Ib.

A codicil republishes a will so as to pass to a residuary devisee lands purchased by testator between the times of making the will and the codicil, although purchased with the proceeds of the sale of a plantation which was otherwise disposed of by the will. Drayton v. Rose, 64 D. 731.

A will limited in its operations by conditions that defeat it before the death of the testator is void unless republished by the testator. Vickery v. Hobbs, 73 D. 238.

If a will has been defeated by its own limited conditions, its mere possession and preservation by the testator until his death does not amount to a republication. Ib.

A will was revoked by the subsequent birth of a child. Held, that republication could not be proved by parol evidence. Carey v. Baughn, 14 R. 534.

22. Necessity of attesting witnesses.—A will must have witnesses where they are required by statute. Burlington University v. Barrett, 92 D. 376.

The statutory requirement of witnesses to the execution of an instrument means subscribing witnesses. Beach v. Botsford, 40 D. 45.

Real estate does not pass by a will whose execution has not been attested by witnesses. Ellis v. Ellis, 50 D. 132.

An express direction by a testator to a third person to sign his name to his will is a substantive part of the execution, under the Pennsylvania statute of 1833, and must be proved expressly or presumptively by the oaths or attestations of two witnesses. Greenough v. Greenough, 51 D. 567.

A will duly attested, giving a sum of money to a trustee to appropriate the same in such manner as the testator may by any instrument in writing under his hand direct and appoint, and an appointment by a separate instrument in writing signed by the testator, but not attested as required by the statute of wills, declaring the appropriation and naming the beneficiary, do not operate to create a valid bequest in favor of the beneficiary, and cannot be enforced as such. And where no charity is declared or indicated in the will, the fact that the legacy is appropriated by the unattested instrument to a public charity does not give to it any greater legal effect. Thayer v. Wellington, 85 D. 753.

23. Their competency.—The inhabitants of an incorporated society, to whom property is devised for the support of a school, are competent witnesses to attest the will. Cornwell v. Isham, 2 D. 50.

"Credible" means "competent" in the statute 1783, 24, relating to the attestation of wills by three credible witnesses. Hawes v. Humphrey, 20 D. 481.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

At the time of the attestation the witness must be competent. Ib.

A witness is not incompetent to attest a will because he resides in a portion of a town to which the testator bequeathed certain property through the medium of trustees, after a life estate in the testator's wife. Ib.

A subscribing witness to a will should be satisfied from his own knowledge that the testator understands what he is doing, and is of sound and disposing mind and memory. Scribner v. Crane, 21 D. 81.

A witness' attestation certifies to his knowledge of the testator's mental capacity, and that he executed the will freely and understandingly, knowing its contents. Ib.

A witness not personally satisfied of these facts is incompetent to prove the due execution of the will. Ib.

The lands acquired by testator after the execution of his will do not pass by a general devise therein. Meador v. Sorsby, 36 D. 432.

An equitable estate is governed by same rules as a purely legal estate, so far as the power to pass after-acquired lands by will is concerned. Ib.

The term "credible witness," as applied to an attesting witness to a will, means a witness who was competent at the time of the attestation. Higgins v. Carlton, 92 D. 666.

A wife is not a competent witness to her husband's will. Pease v. Allis, 14 R. 591. Or to a will containing a devise to her husband. Sullivan v. Sullivan, 8 R. 356.

By statute it was provided that "all beneficial devises made in any will to a subscribing witness thereto shall be wholly void, unless there are three other competent witnesses to the same." A wife was one of the three subscribing witnesses to a will containing a devise to her husband. It was contended that the devise to her husband was a "beneficial devise" to the wife, and, therefore, void, leaving her a competent attesting witness to the rest of the will. Held, that the contention could not be maintained, and there not being the required number of competent witnesses required by law, the will was invalid. Ib.

An executor acting as such, who has no beneficial interest under the will, is a competent witness to establish the same. If he acts bona fide in the performance of his duties, his compensation for services is not dependent upon the will being proved; consequently he is not, for that reason, incompetent to prove the same. Comstock v. Hudlyme, Ec. Soc., 20 D. 100. S. P., Meyer v. Fogg, 68 D. 441; Stewart v. Harriman, 22 R. 408.

24. The requisite number of witnesses. — An amendment of the statute after the execution of a will of personalty, and before the testator's death, relating to the number of attesting witnesses required, applies to such will, and renders it void if it is not attested by the specified number. Elcock's Will, 17 D. 703.

25. Request that witnesses attest. — A request by a testator to subscribing witnesses to attest his will is necessary, and in an action to recover land devised by the will, if the subscribing witnesses disagree as to whether or not one of them was so requested to attest, the testimony of a third person present at the attestation, that the testator said nothing, is admissible, although there is evidence of a constructive request by another person in the testator's presence. Rutherford v. Rutherford, 43 D. 644.

Where a testator requests a person to sign an instrument, without stating what it is, and points out the place for his signature, above which are the words "signed, sealed, published, and declared by the above-named Ethan Button to be his last will and testament," it is proper evidence to be submitted to the jury, there being no question as to the two other witnesses, to decide whether the will was duly attested. Hogan v. Grosvenor, 43 D. 414.

A witness to a will need not, according to the English decisions, be informed or know that the instrument which he is requested by the testator to attest, is his will. Jauncey v. Thorne, 45 D. 424.

An acknowledgment of his signature by a testator, whether in his own handwriting or not, need not be formal, nor in any set form of words. It is sufficient that he produces the will, with his signature on it, and requests the witnesses to attest it. Ib.

No particular form of words need be used by a testator in requesting witnesses to attest his will. Nelson v. McGiffert, 49 D. 170.

Where one of two witnesses to a will, in the presence and hearing of the other, asked the testator, "Do you request me to sign this paper as your will, as a witness?" and the testator answered, "Yea," this was sufficient as a request to both the witnesses, and as a publication of the will. Coffin v. Coffin, 80 D. 235.

A testator's request to witnesses to subscribe attestation may be made through any words or acts which clearly evince that desire to them, and the publication may be incorporated with the request. Ib.

Where persons are requested to witness a will, in the presence and hearing of the testator, by one who had draughted such will at testator's request, and they accordingly then and there sign such will as witnesses, they must be deemed to have done so at the testator's request. Peck v. Cary, 84 D. 220.

The law of Maryland does not require that a testator should ask the subscribing witnesses to his will to attest it. His assent, either express or implied, is sufficient, provided the act be done with his knowledge, and not in a clandestine or fraudulent way. Higgins v. Carlton, 92 D. 666.

The maxim, non quod dictum, sed quod factum est, inspicitur, holds good in the execution of wills as well as of deeds. Ib.

A request to a witness to subscribe a will may be made by a third person, provided the testator hears and understands it, and does not dissent. Cheatham v. Hatcher, 32 R. 650.

26. What attestation is sufficient.*

—The signature by a testator or by some one in his presence and by his direction, and attestation in his presence by two or more witnesses, are indispensably requisite to the due execution of a will under the statute. Rigg v. Wilton, 54 D. 419.

The signing of a will may be proved by proof that the testator acknowledged it, although the name, or signature or handwriting was not before him, and though the paper lay at a distance on the table. Eclbeck v. Granberry, 2 D. 624.

Where a testator acknowledges his signature to a will in the presence of the witness, it is equivalent to signing in his presence. Burwell v. Corbin, 10 D. 494.

A will of personalty must be executed and attested as required by the law in force at the death of the testator. Houston v. Houston, 15 D. 647.

A will need not be read by or to the subscribing witnesses, nor is it necessary that they should know its contents. Higdon's Will, 22 D. 84.

The witnesses of a will must sign in the presence of a blind testator, so that he may know and verify, by his remaining senses, that they are actually putting their signatures to the right document. Ray v. Hill, 49 D. 647.

When a will consists of several detached sheets, it is not necessary that each sheet should be separately attested by witnesses, as well as signed by the testator. Martin v. Hamlin, 53 D. 673.

Attesting witnesses to a will may testify to signing in testator's presence, where the attestation clause states only that the will was signed, sealed, etc., in the presence of the witnesses. Lucas v. Parsons, 71 D. 147.

In the attestation of a will, the order of signing is immaterial so long as the signing by the witnesses and testator was all done at the same moment and in the same presence. The English law is more exacting than ours, hence the decisions under it are not authority here. Miller v. McNeill, 78 D. 333.

In proving a will, a literal adherence to the words of a statute, requiring that the witnesses "shall subscribe the will with their names in the presence of the testator," is never exacted, a substantial conformity with the spirit of the statute being all that reason and sound policy requires. Montgomery v. Perkins, 74 D. 419.

Witnesses attesting a will must subscribe their names within the sight of the testator as he stood and not as he might or might not stand. Reynolds v. Reynolds, 40 D. 599.

It is not essential that a testator should actually see the witnesses attest his will; but it is necessary that he should be in a situation to do so if he desired it. Edelen v. Hardey, 16 D. 292; Dewey v. Dewey, 35 D. 367; Maynard v. Vinton, 66 R. 276. As where the testator, being in ordinary health, signed his will in a piazza, and then surrendered his seat to the witnesses to sign, and stepped into the door of the adjoining room and there remained, but could see the signing if standing in or near the door or walking about the room or by taking a step or two from the place where the witnesses afterwards found him sitting, and could hear all that passed. Wright v. Lewis, 55 D. 714.

An attestation in the same room with the testatrix is a sufficient subscription in her presence. Howard's Will, 17 D. 60.

After the will was signed by the testator, who was sitting up in bed, in a small bedroom, it was taken into an adjoining room, placed on a table, and there subscribed by the witnesses, the door between the rooms being open, and the table so situated that the testator could see the witnesses subscribing, if he chose to do so, without materially changing his position. Held, that this was a subscription in the testator's presence. Will of John Meurer, 28 R. 591; Riggs v. Riggs, 46 R. 464.

A testatrix lay in bed, and the attesting witnesses to her will went into the next room, where they signed it, the door between the two rooms being open, but the witnesses signed the will at such a place in the next room that they could not be seen by the testatrix as she lay in bed. Quare, whether such signing was in the presence of the testatrix? Russell v. Falls, 1 D. 380.

Witnesses to a will need not attest it in the presence of each other. Johnson v. Johnson, 55 R. 762; Dewey v. Dewey, 35 D. 367; Eclbeck v. Granberry, 2 D. 624. It is sufficient that they, at different times, in the presence of the testator, and at his request, sign their names as subscribing witnesses. Jauncey v. Thorne, 45 D. 424; Webb v. Fleming, 76 D. 675.

If the subscribing witnesses are unable to write, the writing of their names by another, marks being attached by themselves, will constitute a sufficient subscription. Montgomery v. Perkins, 74 D. 419; Lord v. Lord, 42 R. 565. The validity of such attestation depends upon the signing of the name of the witness by his authority, and in his presence, and not upon the fact of his making a mark or doing some manual act in connection with the signature. Jesse v. Parker, 52 D. 102.

27. What is not.—An attestation of a will in a room adjoining that wherein the testator lay, and between which there was a plank partition, is prima facie evidence of the illegality of the instrument, although such attestation was at the testator's request, and was subsequently approved by him. Edelen v. Hardey, 16 D. 292.

Attestation of a will by witnesses in an adjoining room is not a compliance with statute requiring it to be done "in the presence of the testator," even though he might have seen them writing their names by sitting on the side of his bed. Reynolds v. Reynolds, 40 D. 599.

To constitute a valid attestation of a will, a testator must be so present to witnesses and they to him that he might and probably did see the attestation, and it will not suffice that he might have seen the attestation by changing his situation, or causing it to be changed, or by removing any intervening obstruction. Reed v. Roberts, 71 D. 210.

An attestation of a will made by a testator in extremis, to be in his presence, must be made so as to be within the scope of his vision without his changing his position or removing any intervening obstruction. Id.

It is an insufficient attestation of a will for a subscribing witness to write his name in the absence of the testator, and in anticipation of the testator's signature, although he afterwards acknowledges it in the presence of the testator and of the other subscribing witnesses. Chase v. Kittredge, 87 D. 687.

3. Revocation.

28. The power to revoke.—The revocation of a will cannot be made by one insane or not of sufficient capacity to understand the nature of his act. Apperson v. Cottrell, 29 D. 239.

Powers of appointment and revocation may be exercised at different times and over different portions of the land subject thereto. Asay v. Hoover, 45 D. 713.

The disposition of property to take effect after a grantor's death is testamentary, and therefore revocable. Frederick's Appeal, 91 D. 159.

29. What acts indicate an intent to revoke.*—A jury is necessary to try the question of revocation in all cases in chancery. Sneed v. Ewing, 22 D. 41.

A testator, by directing several interlineations and erasures to be made in his will, with the avowed purpose of revoking it, and by delivering it in that condition to a person to be used as a memorandum in draughting a new will, gives sufficient proof of his determination to revoke such will. Bahanon v. Walcot, 29 D. 631.

Where a testator, prior to his death, sells so great a part of his real estate as to render it impossible to carry out the provisions of his will, such sale amounts to a revocation of the will, except so far as the appointment of executors is concerned, and in such a case the court will decree that the accounts of the executors be settled in the same manner as if the testator had died intestate. Cooper's Estate, 45 D. 673.

The conveyance by a testator of all lands owned by him at the time of making his will operates as a revocation of the will, and those after acquired will not pass by the will. Bowen v. Johnson, 61 D. 110.

A revocation of a will, under the South Carolina statutes, can only be effected in three ways: by an instrument in writing, executed with the same solemnities as the will itself; by obliteration; and by burning and destroying. Floyd v. Floyd, 49 D. 626.

To effect a revocation of a will, an intention to revoke must appear clearly and unequivocally. Wikoff's Appeal, 53 D. 597.

A valid agreement or covenant to convey real estate, such as a court of equity would enforce specifically will, in equity, though perhaps not at law, operate as a revocation of the estate previously devised, as it is regarded from that time as the property of the vendee. Donohoo v. Lea, 55 D. 725.

A grantee in a deed absolute may bind himself by parol to devise the property to a designated beneficiary, and if in pursuance thereof he makes a will, it is irrevocable, and if he fails to execute it, it will be a fraudulent violation of his contract, against which the beneficiary may have relief in equity. Anding v. Davis, 77 D. 658.

A second will inconsistent with the first will, perfect in its form and execution, but incapable of operating as a will on account of some circumstances dehors the instrument, may nevertheless be set up as a revocation of the first. Carpenter v. Miller, 100 D. 744.

The rule of construction when a second will is set up to revoke the first will is, that where the words are imperative, though inoperative by reason of some incapacity in the devisee, they operate a revocation; and where the words are precatory, if the object of the language be certain and definite, the words are considered imperative, creating a trust for the purpose indicated, and operate a revocation. But whenever the prior dispositions of the property are complete, and the words are precatory, and their object uncertain and indefinite, the words will not be held to create a trust or be construed to revoke a former will. Id.

A will containing some twenty legacies was found, with all the legacies except four erased by pen marks, but still legible. The clause appointing executors was erased in a like manner, the names being legible with more difficulty. The testator's signature was still more completely marked out in like manner. In the margin were several additions in his hand-writing, apparently designed for a new will. Held, that the will was revoked. Succession of Müh, 48 R. 242.

A will gave the residuum to the testator's son Daniel and his heirs, and in case the son "should die without lawful issue," to the testator's other children. A codicil gave a specific bequest out of the residuum to the testator's son James. Daniel survived the testator. Held, that Daniel took an absolute estate. Quackenboss v. Kingland, 55 R. 771.

30. What does not amount to a revocation. — Where a will had been made, and subsequently another executed, and the first was found in possession of the testator at the time of his death, uncanceled, and the second could not be found, — held, on evidence of intention, that the latter did not necessarily revoke the former. Lawson v. Morrison, 1 D. 288; Peck's Appeal, 47 R. 685.

If the revocation be ineffectual in law, or if a former will be canceled under the impression that a later will is good, which proves invalid, the first will not be revoked; and if the devisee under the later will is not legally entitled to take, the devisee under the first shall not be affected. Pringle v. McPherson, 3 D. 713.

The execution of a second will that is afterwards destroyed by testator cannot effect validity of will previously executed, though the second contained a clause of revocation of the former will, especially where the motive for making the second will was because the testator thought the first was lost, and, upon finding the first, destroys the second, declaring his preference for the first and directing its preservation. Marsh v. Marsh, 64 D. 598.

A nuncupative will cannot revoke a prior written will or testament. McCune v. House, 31 D. 438.

The revocation of a will of lands in Pennsylvania cannot be made by parol, but is subject to the same solemnities as a will of personal estate. Lawson v. Morrison, 1 D. 288.

An intention to revoke a will, unaccompanied by any of the acts of revocation mentioned in the statute, will not amount to a revocation, even if such acts be prevented by the fraud or force of the devisee, although such devisee may be considered in equity as the trustee of the parties who would have been entitled if the will had been revoked. Gains v. Gains, 12 D. 375.

An ineffectual attempt to alter a will does not operate as a revocation. Greer v. McCrackin, 14 D. 755.

A revocation of a will, so as to require a republication, does not result from the striking out of a devise, or of the name of an executor. Wells v. Wells, 16 D. 150.

The revocation of a will requires the concurrence of an intent to revoke and of some act of destruction or cancellation of the will; a mere intent to revoke, evidenced by the parol declarations of the deceased, is not sufficient. Malone v. Hobbs, 39 D. 263.

The destruction of a codicil cannot operate as a revocation of the will, though this was declared by the testator to be his intention, where the codicil and the will are on detached papers, and where, because of being in different places, the destruction of the codicil can not be intended as a destruction of the will. Ib.

A will cannot be corrected by evidence of a mistake so as to strike out the name of a legatee and insert that of another inadvertently omitted by the drawer or copyer; for there can be no revocation or alteration of a written will of personalty without the statutory forms, and the disappointed intention has not these forms. Yates v. Cole, 53 D. 602.

A testator made certain erasures and interlineations in a duly executed will. After he made the alterations, at his request, two persons signed the will, as witnesses to "the erasures and interlineations made" by testator. What these interlineations, etc., were, the witnesses did not know. Held, 1. That the alterations did not supersede the provisions of the will; 2. That the witnessing of such alterations did not amount to an attestation of the will as altered; and, 3. That the alterations did not operate as a revocation of the original will. Will of Penniman, 18 R. 368.

Under a statute providing that a will may be revoked by destruction or by cancellation, with intent to revoke, witnessed in the same manner as a will, a will is not revoked by drawing a scroll through the signature so as not to render it illegible, and evidence of the declarations of the testator that he had destroyed the will is incompetent. Gay v. Gay, 46 R. 78.

A will was wholly written on the first page of a double sheet. On the fourth page the testator wrote in pencil, "I revoke this will," and signed and dated it. This was not attested. Held, not a revocation within a statute prescribing burning, tearing, canceling, obliterating, or making a new will or codicil, or some other writing signed, attested, and subscribed like a will, as the only modes of revocation. Will of Ladd, 50 R. 355.

Where it appears to have been the intention of the testator to convey all his estate by the will, a subsequent trust deed of the property devised, with a power of revocation, which is subsequently exercised, does not work a revocation of the will. Morey v. Schier, 56 R. 538.

31. Evidence of revocation.*—The declarations of a testator regarding the cancellation of a will are inadmissible if not connected with any act done or attempted by him to effect a revocation. Dan v. Brown, 15 D. 395.

The declarations of a testatrix that she destroyed the will are admissible, not as independent evidence of revocation, but to assist the jury in determining whether a will has been revoked, when it is found after twenty-five years, among waste papers, and in a mutilated condition. Lawyer v. Smith, 77 D. 460.

The execution of a subsequent will having been proved, but not its contents, the former will is not deemed revoked. Nelson v. McGiffert, 49 D. 170.

The revocation of a will must be shown by some overt act apparent in another writing or on the paper itself, and cannot be established by parol proof merely. Hise v. Fincher, 51 D. 383.

Where there is no proof tending to show a revocation of a will, and the question of revocation is left to the jury, this is not such error as can be taken advantage of by the contestant of the will. Taylor v. Kelley, 68 D. 150.

Where a second will is found to be invalid, with the exception of the clause of revocation, on the ground of undue influence, the clause of revocation alone is not sufficient evidence of the testator's intention to revoke a former will. The presumption is that, if the second will is found to be invalid, the testator intended that the first will should stand rather than that he should die intestate. Rudy v. Ulrich, 8 R. 238.

32. Presumptions relative to revocation.—A devise was made to a daughter, "during the term of her life, and immediately after unto and among all and every such child and children as she shall have lawfully begotten at the time of her death, in fee-simple, equally to be divided between them, share and share alike." Held, that her four children, living at the time of the devise, and at the death of the testator, took a vested remainder in fee, and that in case there had been any children born afterwards the estate would have opened for their benefit, and that therefore the children of a daughter who died in the life-time of a mother were entitled to the share of their mother, who was living at the death of the testator. Doe v. Provoost, 4 D. 249.

Where a mutilated will is found, the testator, in the absence of proof, is presumed to have done the act, if it was done while in his possession or is discovered among his papers canceled or defaced. Bennett v. Sherrod, 40 D. 410.

The presumption that a testator mutilated a will does not apply where it is found in that condition under the control of a person to be benefited by its revocation, and where such person, on being asked for it, acknowledged that there was a will, said nothing about the mutilation, refused then to deliver it up, and it was not obtained till the following day. Ib.

A testator's children take a vested interest in the estate devised to a wife, to be divided "amongst my children as she may think best," and on failure of appointment the children take equally at the wife's death. Cathey v. Cathey, 49 D. 714.

A devise was made to a testator's wife during widowhood, and whenever her death or marriage should take place the property was to be equally divided among his children which may then be alive, or who may have left legitimate heirs. Two of the children died intestate and without heirs, and the widow conveyed her interest to the only remaining child. Held, that the latter had an absolute title, though his mother was yet alive, and that there was no just ground to fear that a claim which might be made by his children in the event of his death before that of his mother would be available against one acquiring his title. Manderson v. Lukens, 62 D. 312.

33. Implied revocation, generally.*—The revocation of devises are, at common law, express or implied. The latter are termed revocations in law. Graves v. Sheldon, 15 D. 653.

Revocations in law resulted, at common law: 1. From a total alteration in the circumstances of the devisor; 2. From an actual or intended alteration in his estate; but in Vermont a revocation does not result from an alteration in the circumstances of the testator, nor from an intended alteration in his estate. Ib.

Implied revocations are, in this state, those only which result ex necessitate rei. Ib.

A will may be revoked during the testator's life by any act or fact inconsistent with it. Sneed v. Lving, 22 D. 41.

A material alteration in the circumstances of a testator may, by implication, revoke a will either partially or totally, according to the nature of the case. Ib.

The omission to mention a codicil in the act of republication, in which other codicils made prior to that act are mentioned, implies a revocation thereof; but this may be rebutted by circumstances showing a contrary intention. Wikoff's Appeal, 53 D. 597.

Where a man dies, leaving two separate and distinct wills properly executed and attested, both relating exclusively to the same kind of property, and where by specific legacies and residuary clauses each is entirely adequate to the disposition of all the property belonging to the decedent, the latter alone shall be given effect. They cannot both stand together as constituting but one will. In re Fisher, 65 D. 309.

A will is not any less the subject of a revocation by operation of law because it is made by a woman under the special power contained in a marriage settlement, instead of under the general power granted by law. Young's Appeal, 80 D. 513.

A will is revoked by implication, if the circumstances of the testator be so altered that new moral testamentary duties have accrued to him subsequent to the date of the will, such as may be presumed to produce a change of intention. Ib.

An implied revocation of a will cannot be shown by the declarations of the testator, unless a material change appears in his condition, creating new moral duties and obligations. The change must be in material relations, and not in mere sentiment or feeling. Jones v. Moseley, 90 D. 327.

Evidence of a reconciliation to a child intentionally omitted from the will, and of the dying declaration of the testator that he wanted his children all to be equal, is not admissible to show an implied revocation of the will. Ib.

A will is not revoked by the death of legatees or beneficiaries; by marriage of the testator without issue; by alienation of the greater part of the estate specifically devised; by the acquisition of a much larger estate, nor by the concurrence of all these events. Hoitt v. Hoitt, 56 R. 530.

84. Effect of subsequent marriage.*

— A widow, having children, made her will, married again, and died without issue by her second husband. Held, that her will was not revoked by implication of law on her second marriage, nor by a statute passed after her marriage, which enacted that marriage should revoke a prior will. In re Tuller, 22 R. 164.

At common law the marriage of a feme sole revokes her will so far as it relates to personalty; and the husband's consent to the probate of a will made before marriage does not make the will valid, but the personal property not reduced to possession by him during the wife's life-time is to be distributed among her next of kin. In re Carey, 24 R. 133.

A feme sole made her will, whereby, after certain specific legacies, she gave to a missionary association the sum of $8,000, or, if that should be more than half her estate, both real and personal, then "a sum equal to one-half of" her estate. All the remainder of her estate, "both real and personal," she gave to a church society. She afterward married and died without issue. The husband, who had never reduced the wife's personal estate to his possession, consented to the probate of the will. More than half of the testatrix's estate was personal property. Held, 1. That the will was revoked as to the personalty by the marriage, and was not revived or rendered valid by the husband's consent to the probate; 2. That as the personal assets were ample to pay the bequest to the missionary association, if valid, such bequest was of personalty and was revoked by the marriage; but 3. That the gift of the remainder, "both real and personal," to the church society was a devise of real estate, and was operative so far as related to such real estate. Ib.

Under a statute prescribing the modes of revoking a will, and recognizing revocation "implied by law from subsequent change in the condition or circumstances of the testator," a woman's will is revoked by her subsequent marriage. Swan v. Hammond, 52 R. 255.

Under a statute that "marriage shall be deemed a revocation of a prior will," such a will is absolutely revoked as to all persons by marriage. McAnnulty v. McAnnulty, 60 R. 552.

An ante-nuptial agreement by an intended husband that the woman should hold her property separately and independently, and that the marriage should not revoke her will previously made, nor affect her right to change it subsequently, renders such will valid. Osgood v. Bliss, 55 R. 488.

A woman's ante-nuptial will is not revoked by her marriage. Fellows v. Allen, 49 R. 328; Noyes v. Southworth, 54 R. 359.

35. — of birth of child.*—A father could not disinherit a legitimate child by preterition merely by the civil law, but by the common law he may; and, therefore, while the birth of a child, after the date of the will, necessarily amounted to a revocation by the civil law, it is, by the common law, only prima facie a revocation until the contrary is shown. Sneed v. Ewing, 22 D. 41.

Either marriage or birth of a child may amount to an implied revocation of a prior will; and both marriage and issue are not indispensable to such revocation. Ib.

The will of a married woman is revoked by subsequent birth of a child, but only so far, under the statutes of Pennsylvania, as the child would have taken without the will. Young's Appeal, 80 D. 513.

A testator, having two children, bequeathed all his estate to his wife; two other children were subsequently born to him. Held, that this revoked the will at common law. Negus v. Negus, 26 R. 157.

A will not providing for the children of a testator subsequently to be born is revoked in law, pro tanto, by the subsequent birth of a child to the testator in his life-time, despite a statute providing that it can be revoked only by cancellation, destruction, or the execution of a subsequent will. Fallon v. Childer, 26 R. 164.

86. Revocation by tearing, burning or other destruction of will.—Less ceremony is required in the revocation than in the execution of a will; the former may be effected by obliteration or tearing, animo revocandi. Pringle v. McPherson, 3 D. 713.

The degree of "burning, canceling, tearing, or obliterating," necessary to constitute a revocation of a will, under the statute of frauds, depends on circumstances; the slightest "burning," etc., will be sufficient, if shown to have been done animo revocandi, and the fact that the statute uses the word "destroying," instead of "burning, canceling, or tearing," does not change the case. Accordingly, if it is shown that the testator interlined and erased portions of the will, and tore off the seals, with the intention to revoke it, the revocation will be complete; and the fact that he intended at the time to make another will, but failed to do so, will not revive the former will. Johnson v. Brailsford, 10 D. 601.

The destruction of a will is not a revocation unless the testator had at the time capacity to understand the nature and effect of the act, and performed it, or directed it to be performed, voluntarily, with intent to effect revocation. Rhodes v. Vinson, 52 D. 685.

A will is not revoked by any act of spoliation or destruction not deliberately done, animo revocandi. White v. Casten, 59 D. 585.

Where a revocation of a will is attempted by burning, there must be a present intent on the part of the testator to revoke, and this intent must appear by some act or symbol, appearing on the script itself, so that it may not rest upon mere parol testimony, and if the script is in any part burned or singed, it is sufficient to revoke the will. Ib.

A will is revoked by burning where the testator threw it into the fire with the intent to revoke and destroy it, and after he had turned away his wife took the paper from the fire secretly, and concealed it; and the testator up to the time of his death thought the will was destroyed, and so frequently expressed himself, the script having been burned through in three different places, the outside scorched, and the edges of the paper singed, although no word or letter of the writing was in any manner destroyed or obliterated. Ib.

A will is not ipso facto revoked by a letter of testator to his agent directing the agent to destroy the will. Tynan v. Paschal, 84 D. 619.

A direction by a testator that his will be destroyed, though accompanied by a belief upon his part that such direction was carried out by the person to whom it was delivered, cannot operate a revocation of a will even of personal estate. Malone v. Hobbs, 39 D. 263; Hise v. Fincher, 51 D. 383.

The cancellation or destruction of a will, to operate a revocation thereof, must be directed against the will as a whole. Malone v. Hobbs, 39 D. 263.

A statute provided that no will shall be revoked unless the testator shall destroy or "mutilate" the same. A testator drew pencil lines across his signature, with intent to revoke, but left the signature still legible. Held, a "mutilation." Woodfill v. Patton, 40 R. 269.

Under a statute providing that no will shall be revoked or altered except by another will, or "unless such will be burnt, torn, canceled, obliterated, or destroyed," etc., an obliteration in part is ineffectual to work a revocation. Lovell v. Quitman, 42 R. 254.

87. Revocation pro tanto.—Revocations pro tanto either alter the quality of the estate, or diminish the quantity of the thing devised. Graves v. Sheldon, 15 D. 653.

A residuary devise of "all his estate, whether real or personal," will pass a mortgage held by the testator at the time of making his will; and a foreclosure of the mortgage or a release of the equity of redemption will revoke such a devise. Ballard v. Carter, 16 D. 377.

Ademption or translation of a legacy may be an implied revocation pro tanto. Sneed v. Ewing, 22 D. 41.

The cancellation of a part of a will by a testator, is an equivocal act whose legal effect depends on extrinsic proof of circumstances indicating the intention with which it was done; and, although it is prima facie evidence of intent to revoke, parol testimony is admissible to show that the intention to cancel applied only to so much of the instrument as was actually canceled. Brown's Will, 35 D. 174.

A will signed by a testator on any part of it, after he had cut off a portion of the original instrument, is still valid, if it appears from the circumstances attending the cancellation and subsequent signing that it was the testator's intention that the uncanceled part should continue to be his will. Ib.

A valid will of real and personal estate, executed according to the requirements of the statute, may be revoked as to the personal estate, or a part of it by any instrument in writing which would, if standing alone, be a good will of personal estate. Marston v. Marston, 43 D. 611.

A subsequent will does not revoke a former one, unless it contains a clause of revocation, or is wholly inconsistent with such former will. If partly inconsistent, it is a revocation pro tanto only. Nelson v. McGiffert, 49 D. 170.

The cancellation of a bequest, standing separately from other bequests, does not cancel the other bequests. Wikoff's Appeal, 53 D. 597.

An agreement revoking a will in part does not work a revocation as to the remaining property mentioned in the will but not in the agreement. Taylor v. Kelley, 68 D. 150.

Under a statute which provides that "no will shall be revoked, unless by burning, tearing, canceling, or obliterating the same, with the intention of revoking it, by the testator himself, or by some person in his presence, or by his direction, or by some other will, codicil, or writing, signed, attested, and subscribed in the manner provided for making a will,"—held, that an erasure by a testator of certain clauses in his will, with the intention of revoking only those clauses, is a valid revocation of those clauses, but not of the whole will; and the property therein referred to passes under the residuary clause, in the absence of evidence of a contrary intention. Bigelow v. Gillott, 25 R. 32.

A conveyance of part of the bequeathed property by the testator in his life-time, operates as a revocation pro tanto. Hawes v. Humphrey, 20 D. 481; Graves v. Sheldon, 15 D. 653.

The testator devising the use of a house for life, and afterwards leasing the property for a term extending beyond his death, and collecting rent in advance, thereby revokes the devise pro tanto, and the devisee can not charge his estate for the rent so collected, nor for rent not collected by the testator, which, for any cause, remains unpaid by the lessee. Higgin v. Swett, 39 D. 716.

38. Effect of revocation.*—A revocation of a subsequent will does not, ipso facto, revive a former will which had been expressly or impliedly revoked by the latter. Bohanon v. Walcot, 29 D. 631.

A will, when revoked, has neither a present nor a potential existence, and it requires a new testamentary act on the part of the testator to revive it. Ib.

The law as to the revocation of wills is the same in courts of law and equity; a will once revoked cannot become operative again without republication. Donohoo v. Lea, 55 D. 725.

The revocation of a will which revokes a former will does not revive such former will, nor can it be revived except by republication in writing duly attested, or by codicil duly executed. Harwell v. Lively, 76 D. 649. But the subsequent declarations of the testator are competent to show that he meant to revive a former and existing will. Pickens v. Davis, 45 R. 322.

To correct spelling in his will already executed, the testator had it copied, and undertook to execute the copy, and destroyed the original. The copy being insufficiently attested,—held, that the original was restored to force, and its contents were sufficiently established by the copy, with evidence of its correctness and evidence of the testator's declarations. Wilbourn v. Shell, 42 R. 363.

II. PROVING A WILL.

39. Necessity of probate.—The probate of a will means the proof of its formal execution. Higgins v. Carlton, 92 D. 668.

Before probate a will is not admissible as evidence of title to land, nor can one claiming under it prove that it was fraudulently destroyed, and give secondary evidence of its contents. Shumway v. Holbrook, 11 D. 153.

To establish a title to realty, a will may be proved more than twenty years after the testator's death. Ib.

The will of a married woman must be executed in conformity to law, and be proved in the probate court, whether it operates by virtue of a power or otherwise. Cutter v. Butler, 57 D. 330.

Probate will be limited to the property that a wife had power to devise. Ib.

A will does not require probate which was executed before statute of wills in California, the testator having died before passage of the act, the then existing laws not requiring probate of wills. Grimes v. Norris, 65 D. 545.

A will made in another state by one domiciled there must be filed and recorded in the proper probate court in Rhode Island, before it can be allowed to operate upon property in the latter state. Olney v. Angell, 73 D. 62.

Where the proceeds of land directed to be sold are devised, the devisees, before the power of sale is executed, may collectively elect to take the land instead of the proceeds, according to their respective interests, and each of them may ordinarily so elect as to his own share. Mandlebaum v. McDonnell, 18 R. 61.

40. Time of probate.—In the absence of statutory regulation, a will may be admitted to probate at any time after the testator's death, but acts done and rights acquired under a previous grant of administration will be protected. Rebhan v. Mueller, 55 R. 869.

A statute providing for the probate of wills before the death of the testator, leaving him at liberty to alter or revoke it, or escape the effect of any action under it by removal from the jurisdiction, is illegal and void. Lloyd v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 56 R. 378.

41. Who may propound the will. — Wills may be presented for admission to probate by either an executor, legatee, or devisee. Wells v. Wells, 16 D. 150.

Whether slaves claiming to have been emancipated by a will, can be allowed to prosecute, in forma pauperis, a suit to have the will proved and recorded in a court of probate, under the provisions of the Rev. Code, c. 124. secs. 4, 5, p. 481, quære? Winn v. Bob, 23 D. 258.

An executor cannot repropound a testament, pronounced against when first offered by him, otherwise than upon the ground of newly discovered evidence. Redmond v. Collins, 27 D. 208.

The executor is the proper person to prove the testament, and will, at the instance of parties interested, be summoned by the ordinary to produce it, and either prove it and take upon himself its execution, or else renounce it. Ib.

If the executor renounce, any party in interest may propound the testament. Ib.

A devisee may not repropound to the probate court, in its dual character of will and testament, an instrument before rejected by it when propounded by the executor named therein. Ib.

The propounder of a will for probate, whether an executor, legatee, or devisee, becomes the representative of the will for the purpose of its probate, and of all similarly interested, though they are not made formal parties to the proceeding, and may have had no notice of its pendency; and this, too, whether they are sui juris, or laboring under infancy, coverture, or other disability. Schultz v. Schultz, 60 D. 335.

42. Place of probate. — The jurisdiction for the probate of a will having once attached, is not divested by a subsequent division of the county. Lindsay v. McCormack, 12 D. 387.

43. Foreign probate.* — A foreign will devising land in Kentucky must, in order to be effectual to pass the title, be executed conformably to the laws of this state; probate in a foreign state is not conclusive evidence that the will was so executed as to pass land here, and consequently such will must be proved as an original document on any trial involving the title to land in this state devised by it, unless there has been probate of it, or what is equivalent to probate, in the proper court here. Sneed v. Ewing, 22 D. 41.

Foreign wills may be admitted to record in the clerk's office of the circuit court in this state, without probate here, on a proper authentication of the foreign probate; and when so recorded they have the same effect as if originally proved and recorded in the proper county here. Ib.

The right to contest a foreign will in chancery results ipso facto whenever it is recorded in this state. Ib.

The title of a devisee under a foreign will takes effect at the death of testator, and no subsequent registry in this state is necessary to perfect it. Hall v. Ashby, 34 D. 424.

The effect of a decree proving a will is confined to the territory, and things within the territory, of the state establishing the court by which such decree is rendered. And article 4, section 1, of the constitution of the United States, does not extend the operation of the probate of a will, as a judicial act of a state, beyond its own territory. "Full faith and credit" is given to such a decree when it is left where it is found, local in its nature and operation. Olney v. Angell, 73 D. 62.

Section 1 of article 4 of the constitution of the United States does not extend the operation of a decree of a probate court admitting a will to probate to things which were, at the time of the testator's death, without the territory of the state whose court has taken the probate. Bowen v. Johnson, 73 D. 49.

A will, when its validity is not questioned, may be allowed and recorded in one state as a foreign will, where the domicile of the testator, at the time of his death, was in a sister state. And the movable property in the state where the will is so allowed and recorded, and belonging to the testator's estate, will be disposed of under the will, according to the laws of the state in which the domicile was established. Gilman v. Gilman, 83 D. 502.

The probate of a will in another state is only prima facie evidence of its validity, upon an application to a probate court in Rhode Island to allow a copy thereof to be filed and recorded in the latter state. Bowen v. Johnson, 73 D. 49.

The judgment of a court of probate of another state, admitting a will to probate, has no effect upon the title to realty situate in this state. It is otherwise with respect to personalty, for that is controlled by the law of the testator's domicile. Peck v. Cary, 84 D. 220.

44. Powers of court, surrogate or ordinary. — 1. In general. — Where a testator devised certain salt-works to his wife and two near relatives during her life-time, subject to the payment of sundry legacies to a large amount, it was held that the devisees were authorized to make unlimited use of the saline mineral, and of the wood from the land of the devisor, from which fuel was supplied in his life-time, to carry on the works. Findlay v. Smith, 8 D. 733.

The construction and validity of clauses in a will are not to be examined on application for probate of the instrument. Hawes v. Humphrey, 20 D. 481.

The declaration of a testator, made several years after executing a will, that he had been influenced to make it, and had not done justice to his grandchildren, is not sufficient to warrant a court in refusing probate of the will. Nelson v. McGiffert, 49 D. 170.

Where wills are of different dates and their provisions are conflicting, the courts will, if possible, adopt such a construction as will give effect to both, sacrificing the earlier so far only as it is clearly irreconcilable with the later paper, the latter containing no express clause of revocation. Schultz v. Schultz, 60 D. 335.

The construction of an instrument offered for probate is a question of law; and after it is proved to be a will, the court should instruct the jury of its nature as such. Taylor v. Kelly, 68 D. 150.

The entry of a formal judgment that a will is admitted to probate is not essential to validity of probate. A direct statement that the will is proved is sufficient, though entered in the minutes as part of and preliminary to an order directing letters to issue. Will of Warfield, 63 D. 49.

A proceeding in probate is in its nature distinct from an action at law or a suit in equity, notwithstanding the fact that the same court has jurisdiction in common law, chancery, and probate cases. Lucick v. McLean, 93 D. 376.

A paper referred to in a will, and containing directions for the disposition of the estate, but not executed or witnessed as a will, should be admitted to probate as part of the will, if it was in existence at the date of the will and is clearly identified; and when omitted by mistake at the probate of the will, it may be afterward admitted, although the time for appealing from the decree of probate has elapsed. Newton v. Seaman's Friend Soc., 39 R. 433.

The register, as to the probate of a will, is judge, and the admission of a will to probate is a judicial decision. Holliday v. Ward, 57 D. 671.

The duty of a register of a will after evidence has been heard is, in the exercise of a legal discretion, to decide upon it, or refer the decision to a jury; and the propriety of his determination may be examined on appeal. Wikoff's Appeal, 53 D. 597.

2. Probate courts. — The probate court has jurisdiction to decide upon proof of a will of a married woman, and its decisions are conclusive upon parties and privies as to the testamentary capacity of the wife, and as to the assent of the husband to the will where such assent is necessary. Cutter v. Butler, 57 D. 330.

The probate court having admitted a will to probate may receive and admit another will to probate, whether it be consistent or inconsistent with or expressly revoke the former will; and it is not necessary in such a case first to file a bill under the statute to set aside the former will. Schultz v. Schultz, 60 D. 335.

The probate courts of Rhode Island have exclusive jurisdiction over the probate of wills, and the supreme court has no original jurisdiction to hear proof of a will or to allow it. Olney v. Angell, 73 D. 62.

Probate courts may admit to probate a codicil of a will which it has already admitted to probate, though the codicil is written upon the back of the same leaf upon which the will is written, and even after the time for appealing from the decree has passed, if such codicil escaped attention, and was not passed on at the time of the probate of the original will. Waters v. Stickney, 90 D. 122.

If the probate court be wholly incompetent to give relief, and the party have not by his laches lost his remedy, equity has jurisdiction. Wade v. Am. Col. Soc., 45 D. 324.

3. Orphans' courts. — Orphans' courts in Alabama have general plenary jurisdiction of all testamentary cases; and, except in peculiar cases, this jurisdiction is exclusive. Apperson v. Cottrell, 29 D. 239.

A jury may be impaneled in the orphans' court to try the issues joined with respect to a will which is alleged to have been duly executed and afterwards destroyed by the testator while insane. Id.

The orphans' court of Maryland, in admitting to probate the will of a married woman, disposing of her separate property, does not decide upon the right of disposal, but merely the factum of the instrument. The question of power of disposal belongs to the courts of law and equity. Michael v. Baker, 71 D. 593.

4. County courts. — County courts in England, prior to the reign of William I, had jurisdiction of testamentary causes; but the original jurisdiction of probates belongs in England to the ecclesiastical courts, and to some of the courts baron. Apperson v. Cottrell, 29 D. 239.

Equity has no jurisdiction of probate of wills in Tennessee. It readily holds administrators and executors to an account of the funds in their hands, and gives construction and interpretation to testamentary papers, but never exercises strictly probate jurisdiction. This belongs exclusively to the county court. Townsend v. Townsend, 94 D. 184.

A Tennessee county court as a court of probate is not a court of inferior jurisdiction in the technical sense of that term, as used in reference to this subject at common law. Its jurisdiction is not special or limited, but it is general, original, and exclusive. Id.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

45. Who may be admitted to oppose.*—Probate in common form is where a will has been admitted to probate upon proceedings to which the executor alone is a party. Redmond v. Collins, 27 D. 208.

Probate in solemn form is where, by summons to see proceedings, the executor has called in the parties interested to witness the proceedings, and to take what part therein they see fit. Ib.

Parties in interest may intervene in a matter of probate, though summons to see proceedings has not issued. Ib.

The receipt of legacies by the next of kin does not preclude them, where the grant of probate has been in common form, from calling for probate of the will in solemn form, in order that they may be afforded an opportunity of contesting it. Malone v. Hobbs, 39 D. 263.

A decree dismissing a bill filed to set aside a will, because its bequests were contrary to statute, does not estop the heirs from contesting the probate of the will on the ground of defect of execution. Mason v. Alston, 59 D. 515.

The only persons competent to contest the will are heirs of realty, or distributees entitled to personalty. Meyer v. Fogg, 68 D. 441.

The proponent of a will cannot by his acts or declarations defeat its probate to the prejudice of other legatees, notwithstanding he may also be a legatee. Taylor v. Kelly, 68 D. 150.

Parties in interest may contest the validity of the will in the probate court, in Illinois, as well as by a bill in chancery, and in so doing may examine the witnesses who attested the will, as well as others. Duncan v. Duncan, 76 D. 699.

46. Filing a caveat or objection.—The register of wills is empowered but not required to direct an issue of fact to the common pleas in every case where a caveat is entered against the admission of a testamentary writing to probate. Wikoff's Appeal, 53 D. 597.

An issue of fact should not be so awarded when the testimony of witnesses to establish the will is not impeached, and there is no real conflict in the evidence. Ib.

Under a caveat charging the will to be the result of delusion against the caveator specially, the jury's attention should be particularly called to that issue. Lucas v. Parsons, 71 D. 147.

The nominated executor and propounder of a will is the legal party to conduct the litigation involved in a caveat to the will from the beginning to a final adjudication, in behalf of the will and those who claim under it. Lucas v. Lucas, 76 D. 642.

The probate of a will, when objections are filed as soon as the paper is propounded, should not be taken until after the objections are disposed of. Jones v. Moseley, 90 D. 327.

47. Burden of proof on the probate.—The statutory requisites in executing a will must be substantially complied with to render it valid, and the onus to show such compliance is on the proponent of the will. Chaffee v. Baptist Missionary Conv., 40 D. 225; Reynolds v. Reynolds, 40 D. 599; Hardy v. Merrill, 22 R. 441.

The issue of sanity or testamentary capacity is also upon him; and the presumption of sanity does not shift the burden upon the opposing party. Baldwin v. Parker, 96 D. 697; Williams v. Robinson, 1 R. 359.

Not so, however, as to the absence of fraud or undue influence. McMechen v. McMechen, 41 R. 682.

The due execution of a will being proved, the law presumes the testator to have been acquainted with its contents, and the onus of showing the contrary rests upon the party alleging it. Hemphill v. Hemphill, 21 D. 331.

The will of a blind or illiterate person is not invalid because it was not read to him in the presence of the subscribing witnesses, but the fact that it was not so read may be considered by the jury in determining the testator's capacity to make a will, or whether fraud or undue influence was used to procure the execution of the instrument offered for probate. Ib.

The influence which a wife, by her virtues, gains over her husband's affections and conduct, whereby he is caused to make a will in her favor, is no ground for refusing to admit the will to probate. Small v. Small, 16 D. 253.

It is presumed that all sheets of a will written on separate sheets of paper are produced for probate, in the absence of evidence to the contrary. Wikoff's Appeal, 53 D. 597.

48. What proof is necessary and sufficient.*—The mode of proving a will must be in accordance with the law in force when it is propounded for probate. Jauncey v. Thorne, 45 D. 424.

One witness is sufficient to prove a will, if he can testify to every fact necessary to its legal execution, although the statute may require two witnesses to attest it. Lindsay v. McCormack, 12 D. 387; Jackson v. Vickory, 19 D. 522.

The proof of the execution of a will may be made by one of the subscribing witnesses only, although the will be lost, and the witness has forgotten the name of one of the other subscribing witnesses. Dan v. Brown, 15 D. 395.

The evidence of a subscribing witness need not show that he recollects the time and occasion when he acted as a witness. It is sufficient that he identifies his signature, and feels assured in his own mind that he would not have affixed it without first hearing the will acknowledged. Pearson v. Wightman, 12 D. 636.

Where one witness to a will devising land testified that, by direction of the testator, and in her presence and that of another witness, he signed the testator's name, and subscribed his own as a witness; and the other witness testified that he heard the testator acknowledge the will, and that he subscribed it as a witness, at her request, and in her presence, the proof was held sufficient. Welch v. Welch, 15 D. 126.

Proof of instructions for, or the reading of, the will, is necessary where the capacity of the testator is in any degree of doubt. Tomkins v. Tomkins, 19 D. 656.

A testamentary instrument executed by a feme covert under a power is sufficiently proved when it has been admitted to probate before the proper tribunal, and in this court is admitted by the answer to be duly executed under the power given her by the marriage contract. Leigh v. Smith, 42 D. 182.

All the subscribing witnesses to a will living in the state, and competent to testify, ought to be sworn and examined before the surrogate when the will is sought to be proved and admitted to probate. Jauncey v. Thorne, 45 D. 424.

The law does not prescribe a mode of proof of a will, nor require it to be proved as well as attested by a specified number of witnesses. Jesse v. Parker, 52 D. 102.

A will may be good under the Pennsylvania act of April 8, 1833, which provides that "every will shall be in writing, and unless the person making the same shall be prevented by the extremity of his last sickness, shall be signed by him at the end thereof, or by some person in his presence, and by his express direction," where the testator has given complete directions for the drawing of such will, and it has, in accordance therewith, been put in writing in his life-time, and he is so prevented by the extremity of his last sickness from signing it himself or giving directions to another to sign it for him, if it is established in some other manner. Showers v. Showers, 67 D. 487.

Upon proceedings for the probate of a will, the question before the court is simply whether the writing is the last will of the deceased, and whether it was duly executed and published by him as such, and it should be tried unincumbered by any question whether the testator in his life-time has provided for any of his children omitted by his will, and whether such omission was intentional or accidental. Lorieux v. Keller, 68 D. 696.

Parol evidence is admissible when its introduction is required by considerations extrinsic of the will, where it tends to establish and sustain the will, or where it consists of declarations of the testator made at the time of the execution of the will, and showing its legal quality; such evidence is part of the res gestæ. Id.

A posterior will cannot be rejected because inconsistent with a previous one, nor for inconsistency with expressed sentiments of the testator, and suspicions are not permitted to counterbalance the testimony of numerous and uncontradicted witnesses. Pena v. New Orleans and Baltimore, 71 D. 506.

Resort may be had to secondary evidence where direct proof of the execution of the will cannot be adduced owing to the nature of the case; but this must be sufficient to establish with reasonable certainty all the facts which must concur in the execution of a valid will. Tynan v. Paschal, 84 D. 619.

49. What is insufficient. — Parol testimony cannot be introduced to establish the finality or completeness of the act of making a will. Waller v. Waller, 42 D. 564.

Where it appeared by a special verdict that one of the witnesses to a will saw the testator's name signed to the will by a third person, in the presence and by the direction of the testator, but did not hear the testator acknowledge it as his will, and that the other witness subscribed the will on the next day, and heard the testator say it was his will, without expressly acknowledging the signature, — held, that the will was not duly proved as a will of realty. Burwell v. Corbin, 10 D. 494.

When the witness who is produced cannot remember whether or not the other witnesses subscribed their names in the presence of the testator, but presumes that they did so, as he would not have subscribed as a witness if the law had not been complied with, and the other witnesses are living and within the state, the proof is insufficient, because it presents secondary evidence of a fact of which better evidence is within the party's reach. Jackson v. Vickory, 19 D. 522.

Mere want of recollection of witnesses to the will, that the testator indicated the instrument to be his will, is not evidence per se of non-compliance with requisites of the New York statute of 1830, as to publication, where the attestation clause states that the testator declared the instrument to be his will. But where the witnesses testify that neither the attestation clause nor the will was read by them, and that the testator did not state the instrument to be his will, but at the time of signing merely acknowledged it to be his "hand and seal for the purpose therein mentioned," there is no proof of publication, and the will is inoperative, although the attestation clause may state that there was publication. Remsen v. Brinckerhoff, 37 D. 261.

Where a will is signed by direction of the testator, who merely affixes his mark thereto, two witnesses are, under the Pennsylvania statute, necessary to prove that he was too infirm to be able to write his name; and where there is but one witness to that fact, proof by the subscribing witnesses that he afterwards acknowledged the paper to be his will, is not sufficient to entitle it to probate. Cavett's Appeal, 42 D. 262.

Subscribing witnesses must swear that they believe the testator was of sound mind before his will can be admitted to probate. Where one of them testifies that he does not know whether he was or not, — that he might have been or might not, — this is insufficient. He should be interrogated as to his belief. While he may have no positive knowledge, he undoubtedly has an opinion, which the law requires he should state. Allison v. Allison, 92 D. 237.

50. Effect of conflict and uncertainty in testimony of the subscribing witnesses. — The various subscribing witnesses to a will need not agree in their evidence, nor in being able to recollect all the material facts, nor need the evidence of all, or of any of them, support the will. It may be admitted to probate, even in opposition to their testimony. All that is requisite is, that from all the competent evidence adduced the court should be satisfied of the sanity of the testator and the due execution of the will. Jauncey v. Thorne, 45 D. 424. S. P., Rigg v. Wilton, 54 D. 419; Peck v. Cary, 84 D. 220; Higgins v. Carlton, 92 D. 666.

Want of recollection on the part of a witness to a will is not fatal to it, if it be properly attested and signed, and other evidence is introduced showing that at the time the testator called the paper his will, and requested the witnesses to sign it as witnesses. Devey v. Devey, 35 D. 367.

The fact that two of the subscribing witnesses do not swear to all the formalities required by law will not invalidate the will, where the other subscribing witness testifies positively to those formalities, and the certificate of attestation, signed by all of the witnesses, affirms the existence of all the facts requisite to a valid will. Nelson v. McGiffert, 49 D. 170.

The verdict of a jury in favor of a will, sanctioned by the court in which the trial of the issue of devisavit vel non is tried, is conclusive as to all mere questions of fact depending upon the credit to be given to the testimony of the witnesses, and the identity of the paper offered for probate is one of the questions of fact settled by the verdict. Jeese v. Parker, 52 D. 102.

Where subscribing witnesses to a will are unable to identify with certainty the paper in contest as the same subscribed by them, other competent evidence is admissible to establish that fact. Montgomery v. Perkins, 74 D. 419.

Testimony of a subscribing witness to a will thirty years old should be received, though he cannot recollect all the particulars attending the execution; and the jury may give it such weight as they think it is entitled to. Lawyer v. Smith, 77 D. 460.

A will need not be proven by two subscribing witnesses, but may be admitted to probate upon extrinsic evidence, even where one of them denies the due execution. Cheatham v. Hatcher, 32 R. 650.

Two witnesses came to the testator's house for the express purpose of being witnesses to his last will, and the deceased knew that they were there for that purpose. The witnesses also knew that B., who draughted the will, was there for that purpose, and saw him at work upon it. Before the will was read to the testator, they were requested by B. to come into the room where the testator was, for the purpose of witnessing his will, and both went to the door of the room, within a few feet and in plain sight of the testator, and then remained there while, according to the testimony of B. and another person present, the will was read to the testator by B., and signed by the testator; and according to the same testimony they were during that whole time so situated as to be able, if paying attention, to see and hear what was done. Held, that the want of memory of the attesting witnesses, as to what then took place in their sight and hearing, is not sufficient to negative the conclusion that the will was properly attested by them, they having signed the attesting clause of the will. Will of John Meurer, 28 R. 591.

51. Proof when subscribing witnesses are dead. — If the witness produced can testify only to his own part in the transaction, the other witnesses must be produced, if living and within the jurisdiction of the court, and if dead, or beyond the jurisdiction, their handwriting and that of the testator should be proved. Jackson v. Vickory, 19 D. 522; Tynan v. Paschal, 84 D. 619. Accordingly, where only one of the subscribing witnesses was called, who testified to his own signature and the handwriting of another witness who was dead, but could not recollect any of the facts, and did not remember the testator, and it appeared that the other subscribing witness was living and within the jurisdiction of the court, — held, that the proof was not sufficient. Jackson v. Le Grange, 10 D. 237.

All the subscribing witnesses to a will being dead, it may be left to the jury to presume that they subscribed in the testator's presence. Jauncey v. Thorne, 45 D. 424.

52. — or refuse, or are unable to testify. — If the witnesses to a will cannot be found, or though found, deny their signatures, circumstantial evidence may supply the deficiency. The handwriting of the witnesses may be proved, and the jury left to determine from all the circumstances whether the will was published with the requisite formalities. Pearson v. Wightman, 12 D. 636.

An attestation clause to a will, showing compliance with all legal requisites in its execution, is not absolutely necessary to its validity under the New York statute, but that fact may be proved by the witnesses, or presumed from all circumstances, if the witnesses are dead, or otherwise unable to testify. Chaffee v. Baptist Missionary Conv., 40 D. 225.

The attestation clause is not conclusive evidence of the compliance with legal formalities, as therein stated, but may be contradicted by the witnesses; but it is presumptive evidence of such compliance, if the witnesses are dead, or from lapse of time do not remember the facts. Ib.

Infirmity in the recollection of subscribing witnesses is not fatal to a will. The court, in such a case, will not require positive affirmative evidence respecting all the requisite formalities, but will draw its conclusions from all the circumstances disclosed by the evidence. Jauncey v. Thorne, 45 D. 424.

The attestation of the will by witnesses is sufficient proof of a compliance with the statute where, from death, defect of memory, or other cause, the testimony of the witnesses cannot be had. Greenough v. Greenough, 51 D. 567.

Positive testimony of one witness to a will, with the attestation of the other, who has forgotten the facts, is sufficient prima facie evidence of a compliance with the statute. Ib.

53. Effect of the decree.*—A decree of a probate court admitting a will to probate is final and conclusive as to the validity thereof, if not reversed by the appellate court, and is not liable to be vacated or questioned by any other court, either incidentally or by any direct proceeding for the purpose of impeaching it. State v. McGlynn, 81 D. 118. S. P., Colton v. Ross, 22 D. 648; Holliday v. Ward, 57 D. 671.

The next of kin will be bound by a sentence admitting a will to probate, though not a party to the proceedings, nor summoned to "see proceedings," if, at the time of any prior contest over the probate, they had notice thereof and did not intervene. Redmond v. Collins, 27 D. 208.

The executor is in privity with the legatees claiming under the testament, and sentences against the testament, propounded by him, will be binding against them, even though they were, at the time of the sentence, laboring under such disabilities as coverture or infancy, or even if at that time they were not yet in esse. Ib.

The executor and devisee are not in privity at common law, nor are they made so by the statute permitting courts of probate to establish wills of real estate. Ib.

The validity of a will is inferred by law from the register's decision itself, and not from the evidence on which the decision was based. Holliday v. Ward, 57 D. 671.

The validity of will, so far as it affects realty, may be contradicted and disproved in ejectment or partition, by showing that it was not legally executed, or that the testator was, at the time of making it, insane, under duress, or influenced by the fraudulent practice of some interested party. Ib.

Where a will has been approved by the register, it is still no more than prima facie evidence of its validity in a subsequent ejectment for land devised by it; but no court will look into the evidence given on the trial of the issue and reject the will altogether if it appears that an interested witness had been examined. Ib.

The judgment of a court of probate, fairly obtained upon the merits, rejecting a paper propounded as a will, is conclusive upon all claiming under it, whether it is propounded by the executor or by a devisee or legatee. Schultz v. Schultz, 60 D. 335.

The rejection of a paper propounded as a will by a court of probate precludes a resort to the same or any other tribunal to set up the same paper while that sentence remains in force and unreversed. Ib.

The judgment of a probate court rejecting a will stands upon a footing analogous to a judgment in rem. Ib.

A marked distinction exists between a judgment of a probate court for and against a will, where it is propounded ex parte for probate in the first instance. In the former case it is binding while in force, but it may be set aside by a proceeding in chancery under the Virginia statute. Ib.

A judgment of a probate court rejecting a will from probate is upon the merits, when an objection to the jurisdiction is overruled, and evidence introduced upon the execution and validity of the will, though the precise ground upon which the decision rests is not given. Ib.

The admission of a will to probate decides nothing but its due execution and publication, and the rights of one claiming a share of the estate on the ground that he is not mentioned in the will are not concluded by such decree. Lorieux v. Kelley, 68 D. 696.

The reason that a decree admitting a will to probate is conclusive as to the validity of the will upon all persons and all courts, is that the probating of a will is not a proceeding to decide a contest between parties, but

* What persons are bound by decrees and orders granting or refusing probate, see note, 60 D. 353-352.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

a proceeding in rem, to determine the character and validity of an instrument affecting the title to property, and which it is necessary for the repose of society should be definitely settled by one judgment. State v. McGlynn, 81 D. 118.

The danger of holding a decree admitting a will to probate final and conclusive, is obviated by the right of appeal to the supreme court, and the statutory provisions permitting the contest of the decree or of the validity of the will at any time within one year, and securing the rights of persons under disabilities. Ib.

A will admitted to probate must be recognized and admitted in all courts to be valid so long as the probate stands. Ib.

The probate court acquires jurisdiction to probate a will on presentation to it of a petition stating all the necessary facts, and the publication of due and legal notice of time of proving the will, and its determination thereafter in admitting the will to probate is final, except upon a direct proceeding by appeal or otherwise to reverse it, and cannot be questioned collaterally. Will of Warfield, 83 D. 49.

Proceedings for the probate of a will cannot be attacked for irregularity, in a collateral proceeding, by petition to have such proceedings adjudged void on the ground of want of jurisdiction, and praying that the will be admitted anew to probate. Ib.

When a will has been admitted to probate in the county court, the probate must stand until revoked or vacated by that court, or reversed by the proper appellate court, as the jurisdiction of the former is general, original, and exclusive, and every intendment is made in favor of its jurisdiction and the rightful exercise thereof. Townsend v. Townsend, 94 D. 184.

A county court having assumed jurisdiction and admitted a will to probate, its validity cannot be collaterally attacked and set aside in equity, notwithstanding more than thirty years have elapsed since the testator's death, and before the will was offered for probate. Ib.

A purchaser of lands in good faith from a devisee under a will admitted to probate gets good title, although the will is subsequently annulled as a forgery. Steele v. Renn, 32 R. 605.

54. Review of probate proceedings.

—A judgment at law will be reversed where improper evidence was admitted; as where a witness who did not attest the execution of a will, and was not qualified to speak as an expert, was permitted to testify generally that in his opinion the testator was of sound mind; but this rule has its limitations in equity. Clapp v. Fullerton, 90 D. 681.

On appeal from a decree of a surrogate, the review is in nature of a rehearing in equity; and the admission of improper evidence on the original hearing before the surrogate, as where a non-expert or non-professional witness was permitted to testify as to his opinion of the testamentary capacity of the testator, furnishes no ground for reversing the decision in the supreme court, if the facts established by legal and competent testimony are plainly sufficient to uphold it. Ib.

The probate of a will should not be rejected simply because the testator, in other respects competent, entertained the mistaken idea that his eldest daughter was illegitimate, if such idea was not the effect of an insane delusion, but of slight and inadequate evidence acting upon a suspicious, jealous, weakened, and failing mind. Ib.

A paper whose validity as a will is contested, may be read to the jury on appeal from the ordinary, but such reading gives it no validity. Lucas v. Parsons, 71 D. 147.

The technical rules of pleading of the common law are not applicable to the statutory issues made on the trial of the validity of a will in the superior court on an appeal from probate. St. Leger's Appeal, 91 D. 735.

Reasons of appeal are not necessary to make issues to be tried on an appeal from probate. The real issue required by the statute to be tried and determined by the jury is the validity of the will; and every fact which shows that the will is not a valid one is material under that issue, and an element of it, and is involved in its determination. Ib.

Reasons of appeal serve a useful purpose as notice to the opposite party of the grounds of objection to the will which will be relied upon at the trial, and by limiting the party filing them to evidence of the objections alleged in them. But they can have no other practical effect; and it is immaterial, especially after verdict, how they are answered, or whether they are answered at all. Ib.

Where appellants file several distinct reasons of appeal, to which the appellees reply that they are "severally untrue, and if true, insufficient," a verdict by the jury that they "found the issue in favor of the appellees," is a good verdict, and a sufficient finding of the validity of the will. Ib.

A decision of a register repudiating a will, and the verdict of a jury condemning it, are conclusive only as to personal estate, and not as to the title to real estate. Asay v. Hoover, 45 D. 713.

Executors are not liable for costs on appeal from probate, especially if they have been cited in on the appeal, but have failed to appear and defend. Comstock v. Haullyme &c. Soc. 20 D. 100.

The proponents of the will should not be charged with costs, where it is declared invalid in the court of chancery, on appeal, on account of a technical defect in its execution, and they have litigated it in good faith. Chaffee v. Baptist Missionary Conv., 40 D. 225.

55. Setting aside probate.* — An ex parte probate of a will had, at common law, no conclusive effect as to land devised, and as to personalty it was revocable by the order or decree of the court that granted it, or of some other court of original jurisdiction. Sneed v. Ewing, 22 D. 41.

Foreign courts had not exclusive power over probates or administration, at common law, of personal property which was in Kentucky at the death of the testator or intestate. Ib.

A will admitted to probate in common form may be set aside upon petition filed and sufficient legal grounds shown, without an issue being awarded of devisavit vel non to be tried by a jury. Wall v. Wall, 64 D. 147.

A probate court has power to revoke the probate of a former will upon a mere application to it to prove, or to allow to be filed and recorded, a later will of the same testator, as incidental thereto, and it is not necessary to institute a preliminary and separate proceeding for the purpose of such revocation before applying for the probate of such later will. Bowen v. Johnson, 73 D. 49.

The English courts of chancery have deprived parties of the benefit of a fraudulent will in some cases, by decreeing that such parties shall hold the property under the will in trust for the parties who would have been entitled to it if such will had not been probated; but they have in all such cases disclaimed any power to set aside the will or the probate. State v. McGlynn, 81 D. 118.

The principles established in England apply to and govern cases arising under the probate law of this country. Ib.

A decree admitting a will to probate cannot be reviewed or set aside by a court of chancery on the ground that the will was obtained by fraud, or on any other ground. Ib.

Failure to make an order admitting a will to probate on the day specified in the notice, or to fix, by adjournment of the proceeding, a subsequent day for the order, is a mere irregularity, not affecting the jurisdiction, and can only be objected to in a direct proceeding to set aside the probate. Will of Warfield, 83 D. 49.

The time within which an original probate of a will may be revoked or set aside is not definitely settled. On a proper application made, it may perhaps be set aside at any time within twenty years after the original probate is granted and the will propounded for re-probate, and an issue of devisavit vel non made up and tried in the circuit court. Townsend v. Townsend, 94 D. 184.

56. Establishing lost or destroyed wills.* — 1. General rules. — A lost or destroyed will may be established and admitted to probate. Apperson v. Cottrell, 29 D. 239.

A will destroyed by the testator while insane, may be admitted to probate, if properly proved. Apperson v. Cottrell, 29 D. 239.

The whole of a lost will need not be proved; so much as is proved will be admitted to probate. Dickey v. Malecki, 34 D. 130.

A will destroyed before or after the death of the testator, without his knowledge, does not cease to be his will. Dickey v. Malecki, 34 D. 130; Schultz v. Schultz, 91 D. 88.

The contents of an improperly destroyed will satisfactorily proved may be established as a will. Rhodes v. Vinson, 52 D. 685.

If the testator was unduly influenced by fear, favor, or affection, or any other cause unduly exercised, to destroy his will, and such undue influences operated as a pressure and restraint upon the deceased, under the circumstances in which he was placed at the time, so as to take away his free and voluntary mind and will, and so continued up to his death, the will will be set up. Batton v. Watson, 58 D. 504.

A will destroyed by the testator himself in his lifetime, acting under fraudulent and undue influence, is a will "fraudulently destroyed," and may be admitted to probate on establishing facts showing the existence and due execution of the will, and its destruction by reason of such improper influence. Voorhees v. Voorhees, 100 D. 458.

2. Jurisdictional questions. — The court of chancery in Ohio has no jurisdiction to establish a lost or spoliated will. The jurisdiction in such matters belongs to the court of common pleas of the proper county. Morningstar v. Selby, 45 D. 579.

Chancery has jurisdiction to set up a will which has been lost, suppressed, or destroyed. Buchanan v. Mullock, 47 D. 622.

Equity may set up a will where it has been lost, destroyed, or suppressed, either by accident or fraud, but it cannot set up a will regularly probated in the county court until such probate is set aside, no matter how long the will in question may have been lost, suppressed, or fraudulently concealed. Townsend v. Townsend, 94 D. 184.

A court of probate, unless prohibited by statute, may admit to probate a lost, suppressed, or destroyed will, or it may be established by a court of equity. Dower v. Seeds, 57 R. 646.

3. What evidence is admissible and sufficient.*—One witness is sufficient to prove the contents of a lost will. Dickey v. Mal-echi, 34 D. 130; Matter of Page, 59 R. 395.

The entire contents of an improperly destroyed will must be established by the clearest, most conclusive, and satisfactory proof. Rhodes v. Vinson, 52 D. 685.

To prove that the destruction of a will was procured by undue influence, evidence showing what took place in the sick-room between the time the will was sent for and its return and destruction, and also showing the motive by which the party exerting the undue means was influenced, is admissible as part of the res gesta. Batton v. Watson, 58 D. 504.

In proving that the destruction of a will was procured by undue influence, those attempting to set the will up are not obliged to rely upon the testimony of the principal actor in the supposed fraud, but may show the facts by the evidence of third persons. Ib.

The testimony of one witness to the handwriting of one subscribing witness is not sufficient to establish a lost will, when both subscribing witnesses are dead, and where, if the will had been produced, the statute would require proof by two witnesses of the handwriting of the subscribing witnesses, and of that of the testator, if he is able to write. Tynan v. Paschal, 84 D. 619.

The execution of a lost will must be proved by three subscribing witnesses, if in life, and within the jurisdiction, as in the case of the probate of a will in solemn form. Kitchens v. Kitchens, 99 D. 453.

Declarations of the testator as to the making of a will cannot be received as primary evidence of due execution of a lost will, in lieu of the evidence required by the statute; but they are admissible to rebut the presumption of a cancellation or revocation of the will, which arises from its loss or destruction previous to his death. Tynan v. Paschal, 84 D. 619; Matter of Page, 59 R. 395.

The fact that a will is lost does not dispense with proof of facts which must be established in order to give effect to the testamentary disposition, if it were produced before the court. Tynan v. Paschal, 84 D. 619.

The due execution of a lost will cannot be inferred, except in cases of spoliation, from proof of facts which, if the will were before the court, would in no way tend to establish it, and which are usually and reasonably consistent with the contrary conclusion. Ib.

After the execution of a missing will has been duly proved, its destruction or loss, and the facts necessary to rebut the presumption that it had been revoked by the testator, may be proved by such evidence as satisfies the conscience of the jury. Kitchens v. Kitchens, 99 D. 453.

Proof that a lost will had not been revoked by the testator must be very clear and strong. But as in all other cases where there is a conflict, the jury must determine. Ib.

If a testator dies leaving an unrevoked will, which cannot be found after his death, parol evidence is competent to prove its contents, and as thus proved it may be admitted to probate. Foster's Appeal, 30 R. 340. But it is incumbent upon those who seek to establish the will to prove its due execution, and to rebut the presumption of cancellation arising from the fact that it cannot be found at the testator's death. Tynan v. Paschal, 84 D. 619.

A bill in equity against an executor alleging that defendant's testatrix had unlawfully destroyed the will of R., of whom she was the sole heir, and which will gave her a life estate only in R.'s property, remainder to plaintiff; that the witnesses to the said will were dead, and that by reason of the destruction plaintiff could not set out a copy of the said will. Prayer that the defendant might be decreed to hold the property in trust for plaintiff. Held, on demurrer, that the bill was sustainable without proof of the lost will in the probate court. Harris v. Tiscrean, 21 R. 242.

III. VALIDITY.

57. Effect of informality.* — An unsigned addition to a will does not invalidate it on the ground that the statute prescribes the testator's signature to be at the end of the will, if it bears neither upon the contents of the will nor on its interpretation. Wikoff's Appeal, 53 D. 597.

A statute provided that "every will shall be in writing. Held, that a will written and signed with a lead pencil was valid." Myers v. Vanderbilt, 24 R. 227.

58. — or uncertainty. — A will is inoperative and void where its existence is made to depend upon a contingent event, which comes to pass. Magee v. McNiel, 90 D. 354.

Where, under a will, a sum of money is disposed of in two parts, one of which is to be applied to a certain purpose before the remainder, as the second part, is disposed of, and the sum devoted to the prior purpose cannot be ascertained, by reason of the failure of that purpose or otherwise, the gift of the remainder is void for uncertainty in the amount. Beekman v. Bonsor, 8 D. 269.

A residuary devise and bequest to a trustee, "for any and all benevolent purposes that he may see fit," is void for uncertainty at common law, and is not within the stat-ate authorizing grants for charitable uses. Adye v. Smith, 26 R. 424. S. P., Nichols v. Allen, 39 R. 445; Prichard v. Thompson, 47 R. 9; Maught v. Getzendanner, 57 R. 352. But compare Simpson v. Welcome, 39 R. 349.

A trust for the benefit of the testator's "next of kin who may be needy" is void for uncertainty. Fontaine v. Thompson, 56 R. 588.

A will provided a devise and bequest to the city of Baltimore, in trust for the "McDonogh Educational Fund and Institute." There was no such corporation, but there was an organization under an ordinance of the city of Baltimore, called, "Board of Trustees of the McDonogh Educational Fund and Institute," and supported by funds from McDonogh's estate, which carried on a "School Farm," known as the "McDonogh Institute." Held, that the trust was sufficiently certain, and was valid. Barnum v. Mayor etc., 50 R. 219.

59. What provisions are invalid or illegal. — 1. In general. — The rule that a devise to an heir of an estate of the same nature and quality as that to which he would by law be entitled is void, etc., does not apply to personal estate. Lord v. Bourne, 18 R. 234.

A bequest on condition that the beneficiary shall be educated in the Roman Catholic faith is not uncertain, impossible, against public policy, nor unconstitutional. Magee v. O'Neill, 45 R. 765.

A will giving property to one in consideration of personal services rendered and to be rendered to the testator is valid, and may be enforced as a contract after the testator's death. Bolman v. Overall, 60 R. 107.

2. Conditions in restraint of marriage. — A condition in a will in restraint of marriage, generally, is utterly void as against public policy, and the due economy and morality of domestic life. Little v. Birdwell, 73 D. 242.

Where a condition in a will is not in restraint of marriage generally, but is too rigid and restrains the choice unreasonably, it is utterly void. Ib.

A devise to the testator's wife, "during her natural life or widowhood," with remainder, "after her death or marriage," to her children, is on condition of remaining unmarried, and is void under the statute as in restraint of marriage. Stihwell v. Knapper, 35 R. 240.

A testator may, by proper words of limitation, restrict the enjoyment of a bequest to the period during which his legatee shall remain unmarried. Holtz's Estate, 80 D. 490.

A devise to the testator's wife, "so long as she shall remain my widow," is not in restraint of marriage. Hibbitts v. Jack, 49 R. 478; Pringle v. Dunkley, 53 D. 110; Little v. Birdwell, 73 D. 242.

An estate devised to a son and daughter in common, upon condition that should the daughter marry or die it should belong to the son in severalty, — held, that the condition was in restraint of marriage, and void. Williams v. Cowden, 53 D. 143.

Bequest of the interest of a certain fund, to be paid to the legatee during all the term that she shall continue the widow of the testator's son, with a disposition of the fund to others at the termination of the bequest by her marriage, is not a bequest in terrorem, and is valid. Holtz's Estate, 80 D. 490.

A testator bequeathed to his widow his personal property, "on condition that she pay $50 a year to my daughter, Martha Fox," and if Martha should marry a second time, then "she shall not be entitled to said legacy from that time on," and "when said Martha shall have received an amount out of said personalty equal to three-fourths thereof, she shall not be entitled to any more, and the balance shall be retained by my said wife." Held, that the widow did not take the personal property upon a condition subsequent, but as trustee, and that the condition subsequent annexed to the gift to Martha was void, as in absolute restraint of marriage. Crawford v. Thompson, 46 R. 598.

3. Condition against opposing will. — "If any or either of my children shall enter a caveat against this my will, he or they shall pay all expenses of both sides," is a good condition in a will, without a gift over against a devisee under the will. Holt v. Holt, 59 R. 43.

A condition in a will, excluding from a share in the estate any heir or testator who "goes to law to break his will," is valid, both as to real and personal property. Upon a breach of such a condition the legacy forfeited will pass to the general residuary legatee. Bradford v. Bradford, 2 R. 419.

4. Restraints on alienation. — There never has been a time since the statute quia emptores when a restriction in a conveyance of a vested estate in fee simple, in possession or remainder, against selling for a particular period of time, was valid by the common law, and a condition or restriction which would suspend all power of alienation for a single day is inconsistent with the estate granted, unreasonable, and void. Mandlebaum v. McDonell, 18 R. 61.

60. Remoteness. — A limitation over after death of first taker, with ~~ut~~ issue, is void for remoteness, unless there is something in the will to restrict the term "death without issue" to lives in being, and twenty-one years thereafter. Presley v. Davis, 62

D. 396; Brattle Square Church v. Grant, 63 D. 725.

A contingent limitation over upon the death of all the testator's three children under twenty-two, without issue, where the estate is first limited to those children, the shares of any who should die without issue, before attaining twenty-two, to go to the survivor or survivors, is too remote, and therefore void. Wood v. Wood, 28 D. 451.

Where a mother by will bequeathed her property to her three children, giving a certain bequest to each and "his lawful heirs, executors and administrators," and provided, that "in case of the death of either of my children without lawful issue, their part to descend to the others, to be equally divided between them," each will take an absolute estate, the limitation over being too remote. Shephard v. Shephard, 46 D. 41.

In a bequest to two nephews and their heirs, but in case they should die without leaving issue, then over to other persons, the limitation over is not too remote. But both of the nephews dying, and one of them leaving issue, the estate is absolutely vested, and the subsequent limitation is void. The estate vested in the nephews so as to be transmissible to the heirs of the one leaving issue, and his widow is entitled to one-third of the property, and his children to the other two-third parts. Cudworth v. Thompson, 4 D. 617. S. P., Kane v. Gott, 35 D. 641.

A contingent limitation in a will, made to depend upon the dying of a person unmarried and without children, is not too remote under the Virginia statute, and cannot be regarded as a contingent limitation, made to depend on an indefinite failure of issue or children, but must be regarded as confined to the time of the death of the person, or the statutory period of ten months thereafter. Schultz v. Schultz, 60 D. 335.

A devise which is subject to a conditional limitation, void for remoteness, vests in the first taker an absolute estate. Brattle Square Church v. Grant, 63 D. 725.

A will contained a provision by which certain leasehold property was devised to S., and in the event of her death, "without leaving lawful issue or descendants," to W. Held, that the limitation over to W. was not void for remoteness; and that the words "dying without issue," in devises of estates less than freehold, signify "a dying without issue living at the death of the first taker." Allender v. Susan, 3 R. 171.

61. Perpetuities. — An estate so limited that it may by possibility extend beyond the life or lives in being at the time of its commencement, and twenty-one years and a fraction of a year (to cover the period of gestation) afterwards, during which time the property would be withdrawn from the market or the power over the fee suspended, is a perpetuity, and void as against the policy of the law, which will not permit property to be inalienable for a longer period. Barnum v. Barnum, 90 D. 88.

A bequest for permanently keeping burial lots in order and for maintaining religious services is void as to the former. Coit v. Comstock, 50 R. 29; Bates v. Bates, 45 R. 305.

A devise in a will of certain property of the testator to two persons named, "their heirs and assigns forever, and to the survivor of them and his heirs forever, in trust, to sell, dispose of, invest, and manage the same, and appropriate such part of the principal and interest as they may deem best, for the aid and support of those of my children and their descendants who may be destitute, and in the opinion of said trustees need such aid," is invalid. Kent v. Dunham, 56 R. 667.

A testatrix, desiring to leave her estate for charitable purposes, and being advised that she could not effect her design by direct testamentary provision, but only by absolute gift to individuals, in reliance upon their honor to carry out her purposes, gave the greater part of her estate to her lawyer, her doctor, and her priest, by will, absolutely as joint tenants, they promising to observe her instructions. She also signed a letter of instructions directing the bestowal of the estate on intermediate persons and charities of their selection in perpetuity. Held, 1. That the legatees took no absolute interest; 2. That the gifts to charity being repugnant to the statute against perpetuities, the estate was held in trust for the heirs and next of kin of the testatrix. O'Hara v. Dudley, 47 R. 53.

62. Altered wills. — If a testator directs one of the witnesses to his will to make certain alterations therein, which are accordingly made, and assented to by the testator, but not witnessed, the alterations will control regarding personal property, but cannot affect real estate. As respects real estate, the will stands as it stood before alteration. Greer v. McCrackin, 14 D. 755.

Interlineations in testator's handwriting are presumed to have been made at or before the execution of the will. Wikoff's Appeal, 53 D. 597.

Erasure, by testator, of an executor's name after execution of the will, and the insertion of another name, it not appearing when the alteration was made, is of no importance in determining when the will is to be deemed to have been made, for the purpose of ascertaining what statute governs it. Raines v. Barker, 67 D. 762.

A testator may not by obliterating certain words in his executed will convert a life estate into a fee simple, but the will must be effectuated as originally executed. Mackbach v. Collins, 48 R. 123.

A testator after execution of his will drew his pen transversely across the words creating some of the legacies, and in another instance, by means of visible alterations, substituted a less sum than that originally provided; several codicils were added. After probate of the whole, and in the absence of proof that the alterations were made after the last codicil, — held, that the former legacies were canceled and the latter not. Linnard's Appeal, 39 R. 753.

63. Devises or bequests to attesting witnesses. — A subscribing witness to a will, being the son of the testator and receiving but one dollar under the provisions of the will, that being much less than his interest as heir-in-law, is a competent witness to prove the will. Smalley v. Smalley, 35 R. 353.

A witness has no interest in the establishment of a will which constitutes him a mere trustee for one of the devisees. Montgomery v. Perkins, 74 D. 419.

64. Wills void in part — carrying out valid provisions. — A will void in part may nevertheless be good for the residue. Kane v. Gott, 35 D. 641.

An attempt by will to manumit a slave avoids that portion of the will which relates to that object, but does not affect the remainder of it. Webb v. Fleming, 76 D. 675.

An executor and trustee is bound to carry into effect the trusts of a will so far as they are valid and consistent with the rules of law, unless excused from literal performance by the consent of all persons interested, and by the sanction of the court of chancery where the rights of infants and married women are concerned. Wood v. Wood, 28 D. 451.

IV. LAW OF PLACE.

65. When the lex rei sitae governs. — Title to real property, and the validity or invalidity of a devise or conveyance thereof, depends upon the lex loci rei sitae. Hawley v. James, 32 D. 623; Wynne v. Wynne, 57 D. 139.

The construction of a will made in Alabama in relation to property in that state at the testator's death must be such as would be given to it by the courts of Alabama. Sale v. Saunders, 57 D. 157.

66. When the lex domicilii governs. — The law of the domicile as to testaments and succession generally prevails, but it is through comity only, and the rule is not universal in its application. Mahorner v. Hooe, 48 D. 706.

The laws of the state in which testator had his domicile at the time of his death govern the construction of his will, and the disposal of his property. The probate court in such state has original jurisdiction. Gilman v. Gilman, 83 D. 502.

* Law of domicile controls validity of will with respect to personality, see note, 2 D. 454-455.

The validity of a will must be determined by the laws of the state in which it was made. Burlington University v. Barrett, 92 D. 376.

A will of personal property not executed in conformity to the law of the testator's domicile at the time of his death, will not be operative in regard to personal property in a foreign country, although executed according to the laws of that country. Denebats v. Berquier, 2 D. 448; McCune v. House, 31 D. 438.

The validity of the execution and probate of a will in another state, recognized and acted on by the proper court in the state of the testator's domicile, in accordance with its law, cannot, so far as it affects property in that state, be questioned by the courts in Mississippi. Montgomery v. Milliken, 43 D. 507.

The validity of provisions of a will of personality is to be determined by the law of the testator's domicile, and a bequest void by that law cannot be made valid by the law of the domicile of the legatee. Sorrey v. Bright, 28 D. 584; Lowry v. Bradley, 39 D. 142; Montgomery v. Milliken, 43 D. 507.

The laws of the testator's domicile govern the disposition of his personality and the proceeds of his realty there situate, and a direction to invest such proceeds in another state upon trusts forbidden by the law of the domicile cannot be sustained, though such trusts would be valid by the laws of such other state. Wood v. Wood, 28 D. 451.

V. INTERPRETATION AND EFFECT.

1. General Rules of Construction.

67. Interpreting the language. — Words in a testamentary disposition will be presumed to have been used in their ordinary or primary sense, unless it appears from the context of the will that they were used in some other sense; or, unless, by reference to extrinsic circumstances, the use of the words in their primary sense would render the provision of the will insensible or inoperative. Mowatt v. Carow, 32 D. 641; Hoopes's Appeal, 100 D. 562.

When the context of a will shows the testator to have used words in a certain sense, the court should follow this in preference to the meaning given by lexicographers, or that given in various adjudged cases. Carnagy v. Woodcock, 5 D. 470.

The grammatical sense of the words is not always regarded in construing wills, and words may be transposed if necessary. Covenhoven v. Shuler, 21 D. 73.

A bequest by a testator of all his property and the income of the same to his widow, "to be used and disposed of by her for her convenience and comfort during life," authorizes her to dispose of such property whenever her comfort and convenience may require it. Scott v. Perkins, 48 D. 470.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

The clause, "still allowing my wife S. a comfortable living through life," at the conclusion of a will, subjects the whole estate of the testator to an equitable charge, which, if wrongfully withheld, a court of chancery will enforce. Rogers v. Caswood, 55 D. 729.

Words of survivorship relate to the period of division or enjoyment, where the period of enjoyment is postponed by interposing a life estate or other particular interest, or where a future period is by the will fixed for a division. Presley v. Davis, 62 D. 396.

The effect of a will depends in a great measure on its construction; and any law which changes a rule of construction that applies to and governs any of the provisions of the will does, to that extent, determine its legal effect. Cunningham v. Cunningham, 68 D. 718.

Words of limitation must be taken to refer to the time of the death of the first taker, in absence of expressions showing different intention. Sims v. Conger, 77 D. 671.

Where there is some absurdity or ambiguity on the face of a will, ascribable to something either omitted or inserted, and there is clear and satisfactory proof that the insertion or omission was not intended by the testator, the ecclesiastical court is bound to pronounce for the will; not in its actual state, but with its errors removed or corrected. Eatherly v. Eatherly, 78 D. 499.

Where a testator devises all his property to his wife during life or widowhood, and then provides as follows: "My wife are to have an equal portion of the property with the children; if she marries, there is to be an equal division with her and my children of the whole property; there is to be a division each time that either of my children arrives at the age of twenty-one years, with them and my wife; if she marries, she is not to share with the children in their separate division; should either of them lose their breath entirely, she is not to share with my children neither;" the wife, if she continue, sole, is to share equally with the children, and as each becomes of age, or marries, there is to be a division, such one taking his portion absolutely, the residue remaining in common until another like event, until at last the wife and the last remaining unmarried or infant child share equally in the residue. If the wife marries, there is then to be an equal division between her and the children, she taking her portion, leaving the residue in common among the children, to be divided as each becomes of age or marries, such one then taking his portion absolutely, and if any one of the children die before marriage or coming of age, his portion is to vest in the surviving children, the wife taking no share therein. Frierson v. Van Buren, 27 D. 528.

A bequest is of the estate as an aggregate fund to the children as a class in such a case, they taking as tenants in common, and if one dies before twenty-one or marriage, the estate survives to the others. Id.

Heirs of a child dying under age, and unmarried, other than the surviving children of the testator, are entitled to no part of the estate so devised. Id.

A clause, "In the utmost confidence in my beloved wife, I leave to her all my worldly goods, to sell or keep for distribution amongst our dear children, as she may think proper. My whole estate, real and personal, are left in fee simple to her, only requesting her to make an equal distribution amongst our heirs; and desiring her to do for some of my faithful servants whatever she may think will most conduce to their welfare, without regard to the interest of my heirs. Of course, I wish first of all that my debts shall be paid," was construed to mean that the widow was vested, subject to payment of his debts, with the legal title of the whole estate, with the beneficial ownership during her life, in trust at her death for the children of herself and the testator, who take a vested remainder in fee, to be enjoyed at her death, or earlier, at her election; that she has authority to make distribution of said estate amongst, or advancements to, said children, so that they ultimately receive each an equal share; that she may bestow a reasonable portion in behalf of the slaves; that she may sell any of the estate for any of the above purposes. Harrisons v. Harrison, 44 D. 365.

Precatory words are treated as imperative, and creating a trust where the objects of the precatory words are certain, and the subjects contemplated are also certain, unless a clear discretion or choice to act or not to act be given, or the prior disposition of the property import absolute or uncontrollable beneficial ownership. Id.

68. Ascertaining testator's intent.—The intention of testator cannot be shown otherwise than by his will; proofs cannot be received to alter the effect of the will. McC Campbell v. McC Campbell, 15 D. 45; Theall v. Theall, 26 D. 501; Kean v. Hofecker, 29 D. 336; Stoner's Appeal, 45 D. 606.

Parol evidence of a testator's intention, as gathered from the conversations of her family, before and after the execution of her will, is not admissible. Jones v. McKee, 45 D. 661.

Courts cannot give effect to a will contrary to the plain terms of it, upon a mere conjecture as to the intention. Wright v. Hicks, 56 D. 451.

Testator's meaning of ambiguous words in the will cannot be shown by the testimony of the one who drew the will. McAllister v. Tate, 73 D. 119.

The intention must be ascertained from the whole will taken together; and no part is to be rejected which can be given an operation consistent with the testator's general intent. Covenhoven v. Shuler, 21 D. 73.

The court will supply proper words to effectuate the testator's intention if it is incorrectly expressed. Ib.

Construction and interpretation should not be resorted to where the intention of the testator is clothed in unequivocal expressions. Theall v. Theall, 26 D. 501.

An heir may be disinherited by implication, if such implication be necessary to effect the clear intent of the testator. Necessary implication results from so strong a probability of intention, that an intention contrary to that imputed to the testator cannot be supposed. Boisseau v. Aldridges, 27 D. 590.

An heir cannot be disinherited unless the estate is given to somebody else. Ib.

A writing to prevent two heirs named therein from having any part of the writer's estate, but not making any disposition of his property, cannot operate to disinherit the two heirs named, and to give the estate to the other heirs; and this is true, although from bequeathing a contingent legacy, the writing is testamentary in its character, and entitled to admission to probate. Ib.

Introductory words in a will are to be considered in order to ascertain the intention of the testator. And where a testator, who has no other real estate, in the introduction to his will uses the words, "as to such worldly estate wherewith it hath pleased God to bless me in this life, I give and dispose of the same in the following manner," and then goes on to give, devise, and bequeath unto his wife a portion of his plantation, providing that the residue of the plantation be divided among his brothers and sisters, the widow will take a fee in the land devised to her. Schriver v. Meyer, 57 D. 634.

The declarations of the testator are incompetent as evidence to add, to explain, or in any manner control the construction of a will. Mages v. McNiel, 90 D. 354; Couch v. Eastham, 55 R. 346.

While the court in construing a will is not to hesitate to allow testator to alter descents provided in the statute, it is not, on the other hand, to presume from the fact that he made a will that he meant its construction to be at all possible points inconsistent with the statute. Risk's Appeal, 91 D. 156.

69. How far the intent controls. — In construing a will, the intent of the testator is the great point to be ascertained and effectuated. Boisseau v. Aldridges, 27 D. 590. S. P., Baskin's Appeal, 45 D. 641; Wynne v. Wynne, 57 D. 139; Armorer v. Case, 61 D. 209; Eatherly v. Eatherly, 78 D. 499. And this intention must not be defeated because he failed to clothe his ideas in technical language. Bell County v. Alexander, 73 D. 268.

In construing wills, the intention should guide, limited by the following rules: 1. The disposition intended to be made must not conflict with the rules of law; 2. The intention must be collected from the will itself, but this may be aided by evidence of the relative situation of the parties, and the circumstances of the testator; 3. The intention is not to prevail against settled and fixed rules of construction. Kennon v. McRoberts, 1 D. 428. S. P., Covenhoven v. Shuler, 21 D. 73; Comfort v. Mather, 37 D. 523; Montgomery v. Milliken, 43 D. 507; Brattle Square Church v. Grant, 63 D. 725.

The intention of a testator shall govern in the construction of a will in all cases, except where the law overrules the intention; and this is reducible to four instances: 1. Where the devise would make a perpetuity; 2. Where it would put the freehold in abeyance; 3. Where chattels are limited as inheritances; 4. And where a fee is limited on a fee. Ruston v. Ruston, 1 D. 283.

Where the testator has inserted directions in his will authorizing trustees to convey, the court has held it in its power to mold it so as best to answer the intent of the testator. Telfair v. Howe, 55 D. 637.

A disposition made by the testator, in error and in ignorance of a material fact, will not be enforced, when, if carried into effect, his manifest intention will be defeated. Armorer v. Case, 61 D. 209.

A disturbance of arrangements of a will is to be justified only where the testator's schemes prove impracticable, and the interests of all his legatees require a departure from the prescriptions of the will. Drayton v. Rose, 64 D. 731.

Where two of testator's nieces and legatees in his will, each having children, died before testator, their legacies lapse, and their shares will not go to their children, although the testator in his will said that his main purpose in making a will was to provide for his grandnieces and nephews, who would not be entitled under the statute; and that the children of a deceased niece or nephew should count one, and take the share to which their parent would have been entitled if living. Cureton v. Massey, 94 D. 152.

70. Carrying the intent into effect. — Where a devise of real estate upon trust cannot be carried into effect according to the intention of the testator, and is valid by the laws of the state where the property is situated, the courts of the state where the trustees are found may direct them to carry the will of the testator into effect, although such a devise of real property, situated in that state, would not be valid. Hawley v. James, 32 D. 623.

A general and particular intent both appearing on the face of the will, the former, though first expressed, prevails. Chase v. Lockerman, 35 D. 277.

Although the language of a will may make an absolute gift, yet if other appropriate expressions be used which show, with sufficient certainty, that but a qualified gift was intended, a court of equity will look to the clear intent of the testator, and raise a constructive trust when none has been expressly declared. Lucas v. Lockhart, 48 D. 766.

A devise to executors cannot be implied, unless such devise is necessary to give effect to the intentions of the testator. Clendenning v. Lanina, 56 D. 518.

When the intent of testator seems to be to limit an estate to the heirs of the life tenant, no matter how the intent is expressed, an estate of inheritance will vest in the life tenant, but when he intends to vest his estate in certain persons, though they may be the same as the heirs at law, the life estate will not be enlarged, and a power of appointment, general or special, will not change the rule. Dodson v. Ball, 100 D. 586.

A testator made this will: "If any accident should happen to me that I die from home, my wife, J. A. L., shall have everything I possess," etc. He died at home. Held, that the wife was entitled to take under it. Likefeld v. Likefeld, 56 R. 908.

71. Effect to be given to all words in will, if possible. — Every sentence and word in a will must be considered in forming a judicial opinion on it. Turbett v. Turbett, 2 D. 369.

In construing wills, the intention must govern. The intention must be collected from all parts of the will taken together, and not from particular parts or expressions. Myers v. Myers, 16 D. 648.

Words capable of a two-fold construction used in one part of a will should receive that construction which is most consistent with the testator's intention ascertained from other provisions in the will. Covenhoven v. Shuler, 21 D. 73.

A person cannot claim an interest under a deed or will, without giving effect to all its provisions as far as possible. Gore v. Stevens, 25 D. 141.

Mistakes in a will are never to be intended, if a reasonable construction can be found out; and reference to other parts of the will may be had in order to supply an omission or explain a mistake. Eatherly v. Eatherly, 78 D. 499.

72. Resorting to extrinsic facts. — 1. General rules. — When, from the terms of a will, the intention of the testator cannot be ascertained, recourse must be had to all circumstances which may aid in the discovery of his intention. Ehrenberg's Succession, 99 D. 729.

To remove a latent ambiguity, acts and declarations of a testator in respect to the thing given are admissible; also, the relative amount of advancements, and the differences in value of portions of land devised to children, are proper subjects for consideration. Brownfield v. Brownfield, 51 D. 590.

Where one who has been bequeathed a certain "lot" of land by a will, brings ejectment for its recovery, it is competent for him to show by testimony derived from other parts of the will, and by extrinsic evidence, explaining the sense in which the testator used the word "lot," that it embraced a large parcel of ground, and was not intended to refer to an ordinary town lot. Warner v. Millenberger, 83 D. 573.

The testator's knowledge of the contents of the will may be shown by circumstances. Montague v. Allan, 49 R. 384.

When a will fully describes a person or thing, whether by many or few particulars, it cannot be competent to receive evidence that another person or thing was meant, though nothing be found to answer the description in the will. Barnes v. Simms, 49 D. 435.

Where a testator made a specific bequest of negroes, and described two of them as "Aaron" and "Pike," but had no negroes of that name, parol evidence is inadmissible to prove that the testator meant two slaves by the names of "Lamon" and "Pite," and that the other names were inserted by mistake; and the gift as to these negroes must fail, because there is nothing for it to operate upon. Id.

No word or phrase can be diverted from its appropriate subject by extrinsic evidence showing that testator commonly, or on that particular occasion, used the disputed word in a sense peculiar to himself, or even in a popular sense, as distinguished from its strict and primary import. Yundt's Appeal, 53 D. 496.

Where the language is plain and unambiguous, such language must govern, and therefore extrinsic evidence is inadmissible to show that he meant something different from what his language imports; but any evidence is admissible which in its nature and effect simply explains what the testator has written. Warner v. Millenberger, 83 D. 573.

When the court is of opinion that there is no patent ambiguity in those parts of a will affecting the property in issue before it, and no latent ambiguity is raised by proof of extrinsic circumstances, the instructions of the testator to the scrivener who drew the will are inadmissible to show that the testator intended to dispose of his property in a manner different from the direction it would take when the ordinary rules of construction are applied to the words of the will. Hill v. Felton, 15 R. 643.

2. Illustrations. — A testator bequeathed the residue of his estate "equally to the authorized agents of the Home and Foreign Missionary Societies, to aid in propagating the holy religion of Jesus Christ." Held, that extrinsic evidence of the facts known to the testator at the time he executed the will, the names by which the missionary societies were called by him, and the religious society with which he worshiped, his interest in any particular missionary society, and the contributions which he made for missionary purposes, was admissible to identify the societies intended. A bequest to a missionary society, "to aid in propagating the holy religion of Jesus Christ," is valid. Hinckley v. Thatcher, 52 R. 719.

A testator devised land to "the four boys." Held, that parol evidence that he had seven sons, three of whom were adults, living in their own homes, and the other four were minors living with him, and his declarations before, at, and after the execution of the will, were competent to show that the devise was intended for the minors. Bradley v. Rees, 55 R. 422.

A devise of the "west half of the northeast quarter of section 23," in T. township. Held, that parol evidence was inadmissible to show that testator owned the east half of the southwest quarter of section 23, and no other land, and that the draughtsman of the will had erred in putting the one description for the other. Fitzpatrick v. Fitzpatrick, 14 R. 538.

73. Construing separate provisions.

—Interpretation of a doubtful clause in a will will be sought by considering it in connection with the other clauses, and by an examination of the main designs of the testator, as manifested by the whole instrument, when a literal construction of the clause would conflict with the intention of the testator. Morton v. Barrett, 39 D. 575.

The clear intention of the testator should prevail, though it would require some departure from the literal construction of one of the clauses in the will. Ib.

The last of two inconsistent devises or legacies of the same will takes effect to the exclusion of the first. Fraser v. Boone, 27 D. 422. But a clear and absolute gift under one clause of a will is not limited by a subsequent clause except by the employment of clear and explicit terms. Barksdale v. White, 26 R. 344.

A provision giving to the widow the privilege to choose and keep during her widowhood "all such personal property as she may think proper," and directing that "all such property as may then be left" shall be sold by his executors, entitles the widow to such property without security for such articles as may be consumed or disposed of during her life or widowhood; but under such a bequest the widow is not entitled to take money in testator's possession at his death, nor choses in action. German v. German, 67 D. 451.

Where a will shows upon its face what property the testator owned; that he intended to dispose of it all, and supposed that he had done so; that he had disposed of it all except one-half of his land; and that there was left in the will an incomplete clause, omitting to state the subject of any gift, but which was plainly intended to be the other moiety of the land—a court of equity will supply the omission. The omission is apparent upon the face of the paper, and extrinsic evidence is unnecessary to supply it. Eatherly v. Eatherly, 78 D. 499.

A clause is imperative, and entitles the beneficiary to whatever sum is necessary to his support during his life, when it provides that the executor shall provide for the wants of the beneficiary as a matter of humanity rather than legal obligation, and also provides that the interest on a certain sum shall be set apart for his support, directs its application to that purpose, and disposes of any surplus remaining unexpended at his death. Chambers v. Davis, 93 D. 605.

Where, after sundry devises in fee, and bequests to his children exhausting the estate, the testator added, "if any one or more happens to die without heirs, then his or their parts or shares shall be equally divided among the rest of the children,"—held, 1. That the devise over applied to real as well as personal property, and was not confined to the bequests of the personal estate, immediately preceding this clause; 2. That the devise over was good as an executory devise, and carried a fee, this limitation over necessarily referring to the estate before devised. Jackson v. Staats, 6 D. 376.

A will gave a certain trustee certain specified property for the benefit of testator's three sons during their natural lives, remainder to their children if they should have any, otherwise for each other. The same will gave to the same trustee other specified property for the use of testator's three daughters, with a like remainder. Another clause of the will gives the residue of the estate to all six of the children upon the same terms and conditions as above. One of the sons died without issue. Held, that his share in the estate went to the surviving brothers and sisters, and not to the surviving brothers alone. Lipman's Appeal, 72 D. 692.

A testator bequeathed certain property to his daughters and their heirs forever; in a subsequent clause he "loaned" the residuum of his estate to the same children for life, with remainder to their children, providing that if any of his said children should die without an heir of the body, "all the property loaned or given them" should go to his grandchildren. Held, that this limitation applied to the residuum, and not to the previous gifts. Barksdale v. White, 26 R. 344.

A will was written on the first and third pages of a sheet of paper, and signed at the end of the third page. In a devise to A., on the third page, numbered "4th," certain words describing the property devised were erased, and the words, "See next page," were there interlined. On the fourth page was an unsigned clause, numbered "4th," making a bequest to A., and additional bequests to others. The draughtsman testified that the erasure and interlineation and the writing on the fourth page were made by him by testator's direction, prior to the signing, and he identified the clause on the fourth page as the subject of reference on the third page. Held, that the clause on the fourth page was part of the will. Baker's Appeal, 52 R. 478.

74. Effect of repugnancy. — If two parts of a will are wholly irreconcilable, the subsequent part is to be taken as evidence of a subsequent intention. Covenhoven v. Shuler, 21 D. 73; German v. German, 67 D. 451.

If the terms of a devise empower the devisee to dispose of the property, a limitation over is void for repugnancy. Rona v. Meier, 29 R. 493.

Where a testator devised "to his grandson, A. L., three hundred and fifty acres of land, being the upper part of a tract of seven hundred acres; and to his granddaughters, P. L. and J. L., the lower part of the same tract, to be equally divided between them," and the tract was found to contain in fact eleven hundred acres, — held, that the grandson was entitled to only three hundred and fifty acres, and the granddaughters to three hundred and seventy-five acres each. Williams v. Lane, 6 D. 561.

A testatrix, after bequeathing legacies to her several children, directed that "the balance of my estate be equally divided among the heirs of my body;" and closed the will with the direction that "the portion that goes to my sons I give to the heirs of their bodies, and hereby appoint each of my sons trustees, without bond, of his respective portion." Held, that the two clauses being in conflict, the latter must prevail, and the absolute estate devised by the former was annulled by the latter, and converted into a trust estate for the benefit of the grandchildren. Pierce v. Ridley, 25 R. 769.

A will gave to the testator's wife the residuum "for her benefit and support, to use and dispose of as she may think proper," and then provided that if any of the estate should be left in her possession at her death it should be equally divided between the brothers and sisters of the testator. Held, that the wife took an absolute estate, and that the remainder over was void for repugnancy. Stowell v. Hastings, 59 R. 748.

75. Technical words. — The interpretation of a technical term is established by reference to the science or art to which it is peculiar. Ward v. Stow, 27 D. 238.

Technical signification of words must yield to testator's intent, as manifest from the whole will. Scott v. Nelson, 29 D. 266.

Where technical words are used in a will, the testator is presumed to employ them in their established legal sense, unless a contrary intention is clearly indicated by the context. Sims v. Conger, 77 D. 671; Kean v. Hoffecker, 29 D. 336.

76. Interpretation and effect of codicils.* — A will and codicil are to be taken and construed together as parts of one and the same instrument. Westcott v. Cady, 9 D. 306; Beall v. Cunningham, 39 D. 469; Harvey v. Chouteau, 55 D. 120.

A codicil, duly executed, if attached to a paper which was never signed, attested, and published as a will, will have the effect of giving force and operation to the whole as one will. Beall v. Cunningham, 39 D. 469.

77. When will speaks from time of testator's death. — Wills are ambulatory and have no operation until the death of the testator. Marsh v. Marsh, 64 D. 598; Grimes v. Norris, 65 D. 545; Lorincx v. Keller, 68 D. 696. And therefore, if a will is written and executed before the passage of a law, but the testator does not die till after the enactment of the law, the will is created after the passage of the law, and must be governed by it. Price v. Taylor, 70 D. 105.

The English rule is that as to lands the will speaks at its date, but as to personalty, at the death of the testator. Raines v. Barker, 67 D. 762.

A will of personal estate is presumed to speak as of the date of the death of the testator. Collin v. Collin, 45 D. 420; Elcock's Will, 17 D. 703.

A will, as to slaves, must be understood as speaking at testator's death, and those acquired after the publication of it pass thereby. Curling v. Curling, 33 D. 475.

Words of survivorship in a will refer to the date of the testator's death, wherever a gift takes effect in possession immediately upon the death, unless some other time is indicated by the will. Presley v. Davis, 62 D. 396.

The Virginia statute of 1849, making a will speak from death of testator, does not apply to a will previously made, so as to determine its validity or effect, though the testator died after that statute was enacted, such wills being expressly exempted from its operation. Raines v. Barker, 67 D. 762.

A wife devised all her property to her husband for life, and provided that if he survived her, the same should go at his death to her step-daughter. The husband died before the wife. Held, that the wife was intestate. Gibson v. Seymour, 52 R. 688.

78. What estate or interest will pass. — 1. In general. — A trust estate will pass under a general clause in a will relating to the realty, unless the intention of the testator appear from the will to be otherwise. Jackson v. Delancy, 7 D. 403.

A testator cannot by will create an estate which, by the rules of the common law, he could not in his life-time create by deed. Mullany v. Mullany, 31 D. 238.

Title passes by descent, and not by purchase, the former being the worthier title, where the same quantity and quality of estate is devised that the devisee would have acquired by descent. Gilpin v. Hollingsworth, 56 D. 737.

Where testator uses general words conveying his whole estate, all that he has at his decease will pass thereby. Wynne v. Wynne, 57 D. 139.

Prima facie a gift of the product of a fund is the gift of that product in perpetuity, and consequently a gift of the fund itself. Robert's Appeal, 98 D. 312.

A testatrix appointed her eldest son executor, and gave him all her property, he to pay her debts and the school and college expenses of her younger son, making no other provision for the younger son. Her personal property amounted to $20, and her real estate to $1,500. Held, that the legacy was a charge on the real estate. Thayer v. Finnegan, 45 R. 285.

2. Fee simple. — One who devises a fee-simple estate parts with all the interest he had, and will not be permitted to say that such estate shall not be subject to all the restraints imposed upon it by law. Mullany v. Mullany, 31 D. 238.

The absolute interest in a house is devised to a daughter by a will giving and granting "to my beloved son, J. N., all my property, after the decease of my beloved wife, or marriage, he paying the legacies herein mentioned; also to my daughter, P. N., two hundred dollars, to be paid as above mentioned, the horse I now own" (describing it), "and to live and remain, so long as she is unmarried, in my house, and to have and enjoy the same privileges as she now does, and also one good cow," and testator's language is not matter of advice to the son. Maeck v. Nason, 52 D. 41.

The rules of the common law with respect to the quantity of interest conveyed by a will do not apply in Texas, where the statute provides that where an estate in lands is created by will it will be deemed to be an estate in fee simple if a less estate be not limited by express words. Bell County v. Alexander, 73 D. 268.

In a will by employing the words, "I wish the county in which I die and am buried to have and enjoy, for the benefit of public schools, two-thirds of the land in the county I am buried in," taken in connection with the words "my land," and "the land I own," used in other parts of the will, show an intention on the part of the testator to devise an estate in lands, and there being no words limiting its quantity, will be held to convey an estate in fee simple. Ib.

At common law, an estate in lands created by will, will be enlarged to and held to be an estate in fee simple, where the land is charged with a trust which cannot be performed, or where the will directs an act to be done which cannot be accomplished, unless a greater estate than one for life be taken. Ib.

3. Interest vested in widow — A devise which contains a specific direction that all of testator's property shall remain upon his plantation, consisting of two separate tracts of land, in charge of his wife, until his youngest son shall attain full age, and then proceeds to bequeath one tract to that son and another, and one-third of the remaining tract to his wife, for her life, vests in the wife, by implication, a chattel interest in the whole of both tracts, during the son's minority. Bradshaw v. Ellis, 32 D. 686.

Choses in action do not pass to the wife by a bequest of "all my property to my wife," and after her death "to be sold," etc. Pip-pin v. Ellison, 55 D. 403.

Where a testator bequeaths negroes to his wife, to be disposed of by her, with their increase, to the whole, or any one or more, of his children, as she may think proper, at her decease, the wife takes an estate for life, with power to dispose of the property to one or more of the children as she chooses; and her power is coupled with an interest as well as a trust. Cruse v. McKee, 73 D. 186.

A testator by will devised to his wife certain real and personal property during her widowhood, and directed his executors to sell it thereafter, the proceeds to be divided among all his children or their heirs or assigns in equal shares; also, that the balance or residue of his real and personal estate which had not been devised for life to his wife, should be sold, the proceeds to be divided equally among his children, excepting one daughter, who was to have only the interest of one share during life. Held, that she took under the will an absolute and not a life estate in one share, which her administrator, after her death, was entitled to recover. Silkknitter's Appeal, 84 D. 494.

A testator gave his widow certain personal estate, and provided that if any remained at her decease, it should be equally divided among his children. Held, that an absolute power of disposal was given to the widow, and that the gift over was inconsistent with this power, and therefore void.

McKenzie's Appeal, 19 R. 525. Compare Henderson v. Blackburn, 44 R. 780.

A will provided, "To my wife the provision made for her by the statutes of this state I deem sufficient;" and after giving sundry legacies, concluded by giving to the testator's son, "all the residue of my estate after paying the above bequests, legacies, and my debts, and the expenses of settling my estate." Held, that the wife took such a share as if the testator had died intestate. Kelly v. Reynolds, 33 R. 418.

A will contained the following clause: "To my beloved wife P. (so long as she remains my widow) I give all the income of the home farm on which I now live, containing two hundred acres, more or less, with all the tenements and appurtenances belonging thereto, together with all the products arising therefrom; also, the mansion house in which I live, together with all belonging to it, and all that is in it, or about it, I give to my beloved wife P., the same to be hers and to belong to her forever." Held, that the widow took an estate in the realty for life and widowhood, and an absolute estate in the personal property. Cooper v. Pogue, 37 R. 681.

B. by will gave his wife the use and income of his homestead for life; also "every article of household furniture in or on said premises, including piano, books, minerals, shells, and curiosities, and every article of personal property in and about said homestead, or wherever found, belonging to my estate;" also "the dividends and income on all my railroad shares I may own at the time of my decease, and also the interest and income on all my government and other bonds which I may possess at the time of my decease," with residuum to others. Held, that the shares and bonds, and money and notes did not pass to the wife. Benton v. Benton, 56 R. 512.

4. Illustrations. — A testatrix devised real estate to her daughter and sole heir, S., for life; but "if the said S. shall have a child to cry," then to said child; and if said child should die, then over. S. and her husband conveyed the estate with warranty to P., and four months after S. had a child, W., born alive. W. recovered judgment in an action of ejectment against the grantee of P. In an action by the grantee of P. against P., on the covenant of warranty. — held, 1. That the life estate of S. under the will was not merged by the descent of the fee; 2. That the remainder in fee was vested in W., he being en ventre sa mere at the time of the conveyance from S.; 3. That W. was not barred by the warranty of his parents. Crisfield v. Storr, 11 R. 480.

A testator gave all the rents and profits of his whole estate to his widow during life, or while she should be his widow, and directed that no portion of his estate should be sold but in accordance with his will. The proceeds of such parts of his estate as should be sold were to be paid to the devisees named in the will, among whom were included all his heirs at law, according to their respective shares, by the executors. The will further provided, that certain of the real estate should remain unsold until F., one of the devisees, should be twenty-five years of age, or "until twenty-one years from the date hereof, in case of his death," and also required that each devisee should contract in writing that he would not "either dispose of, alienate, mortgage, barter, pledge, or transfer any of the real estate, or any of the proceeds thereof," before any of the proceeds of the sales directed by the will should be paid to him. There was no express authorization to the executors to sell the real estate, and no limitation over. Held, 1. That the testator intended to and did give to the executors a power to sell his real estate, but this was a naked power, without estate or interest; 2. That the widow took an estate during life or widowhood; 3. The devisees a remainder in fee which vested in presenti; 4. That the restrictions against sale were invalid, (1) as the whole estate was centered in the devisees, and no party but themselves could enforce the obligation; and (2) as being in contravention of the rule against perpetuities. Mandlebaum v. McDonnell, 18 R. 61.

A testator owned two parcels of land near Cropwell; one containing seventy-two and sixty-two hundredths acres, which had been conveyed to him by the heirs of his deceased wife, the other containing fourteen and seventy-three hundredths acres, which had been conveyed to him by Abel Lippencott. The two parcels adjoined each other, had long been rented and cultivated together, and his son Thomas resided on the first, but used and cultivated both. The testator devised to his son Thomas, "all that my farm and plantation near Cropwell conveyed to me by the heirs of my deceased wife, and where my son Thomas now resides, containing about eighty-five acres, more or less." The court admitted the testimony of the draughtsman of the will, that the written instructions for the will contained only the words, "my Cropwell farm, containing eighty-five acres," and that the words, "conveyed to me by the heirs of my deceased wife," were inserted by the draughtsman himself in the will, to distinguish the premises from the testator's other property. Held, error, and that only the parcel conveyed to the testator by the heirs of his deceased wife passed under that devise. Griscom v. Evans, 29 R. 251.

A testator provided as follows: "I hereby give, devise, and bequeath to my son S., and to his heirs and assigns forever, upon his attaining the age of twenty-one years, all my Shot Tower property, consisting of Shot Tower, buildings, and lots of ground connected therewith * * * with all the appurtenances, machinery, fixtures, and personal property therein and thereto belonging." At the testator's death there was in the shot tower a large quantity of manufactured shot and of unmanufactured material. It was apparent from the will that the testator intended that his son should carry on the business on coming of age. Held, that the son was entitled to the unmanufactured shot but not to the manufactured shot. Spark's Appeal, 33 R. 740.

A testator bequeathed a fund as follows: in equal shares, one to his married daughter, Melinda; one to Amanda, Anna, and Clara, his minor daughters; and one to each of two other married daughters for life. Held, that the three minor daughters took each one equal share with the others. Holman v. Price, 37 R. 614.

A testator gave his entire estate in trust for his daughter. The trustees were directed to apply the whole income, if necessary, to her support and maintenance, and when she became eighteen, or was married, they could deliver to her the whole estate or not, in their discretion. In case she died before eighteen, the estate was otherwise disposed of. She never married, and died at twenty-three, the trustees still holding the fund. Held, that she took a vested estate at eighteen, at least, and that it passed to her devisees. Weatherhead v. Stoddard, 56 R. 573.

A testator devised real estate to his executors in trust for his children, the trustees to have the management and control until the children should marry; "and when any of my said children shall marry, with the consent of said executors, any worthy person, then the part or portion of property herein devised, or the proceeds thereof, * * * shall be and become the property of said child so marrying, and my said executors shall make the necessary conveyance thereof, so as to vest the absolute title in said legatee." Held, that the marrying of a child with the consent of the executors was not a condition precedent to the vesting in him or her of an interest in the estate, but only a condition for the termination of the trust as to the one so marrying; and that the children took an immediate vested interest. Toner v. Collins, 56 R. 346.

A testator devised and bequeathed all his property to his wife for life, and provided that at her death any and all of the property and estate so granted, "or any part of the same then left by her," should be divided among his children. He also made it "a condition that my said wife shall, out and from said property left her, provide for the maintenance and education of my children." Power to sell and convert the property was given to the executors. Held, 1. That a life estate in the realty vested in the wife and a remainder in fee in the children, and so as to the personalty; 2. An implied power of disposition was given to the widow of so much of the capital fund as might be reasonably necessary for her own support and the maintenance and education of the children after first applying the income thereto; 3. That the provision for the widow was in consideration that she should so provide for the children, and the income was the primary fund for her and their support. The donee for life of personal property is entitled to the possession thereof without executing security for its safe-keeping, except in cases of real danger. It is not usual or proper in practice to exact anything more in the first instance than the filing of an inventory in the proper court. Estate of Oertle, 57 R. 48.

A testator devised lands in fee to a trustee in trust for his daughter, with a provision that neither she nor her husband should ever dispose of them. Held, that the restraint was ineffectual at any time while she was single, but became operative upon and during any marriage contracted by her before disposing of them. Robinson v. Randolph, 58 R. 692.

79. Interpretation of the word "children."—1. Generally.—"Children" is a technical word, and is always construed a word of purchase, unless controlled by other words showing it intended as a word of limitation. Kay v. Connor, 49 D. 690; Carr v. Estill, 63 D. 548; Coursey v. Davis, 84 D. 519.

It is lawful to construe "children" as a word of limitation when the will necessitates such a construction. Coursey v. Davis, 84 D. 519.

A bequest to one for life, and "to her children forever," gives an absolute estate in personalty. Shearman v. Angel, 23 D. 166.

A bequest to one's children generally will be construed to embrace all who are his children at the date of his decease, although the money is directed to be paid "to each of them for the use of their respective children, and by each of them so applied," although some of them have no children. Chase v. Lockerman, 35 D. 277.

A limitation to "my children" gives all children of testator immediate interests that are transmissible to executors. Weeks v. Weeks, 47 D. 358.

A devise to a woman "and her children," she being unmarried and having no children at the time, where she afterwards marries and has children, confers upon her, in Kentucky, an estate for life, with remainder to her children; though it would confer an estate-tail in England. Carr v. Estill, 63 D. 548.

* Children, devises and bequests to, as a class, see note, 46 D. 666-667.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume 1.

A devise to "children" of the testator's son comprehends only the children living at the testator's death. Shotts v. Poe, 28 R. 485.

Testator bequeathed his property to his wife for life, and then as follows: "Upon the decease of my said wife, I give all my said estate to such of my children as may be living at the time of her decease, and to the issue of those who may have deceased." One of the testator's children died in his life-time, leaving a child, who died after the death of the testator, and before that of his widow. Held, that such child had a vested interest under the will, to which his administrator was entitled after the death of the widow. Austin v. Bristol, 16 R. 23.

2. When includes "grandchildren."—"Children," when used in a will, does not ordinarily include grandchildren; but grandchildren and great-grandchildren may take under this word, if necessary to accomplish the testator's intentions. Scott v. Nelson, 29 D. 266; Dickinson v. Lee, 28 D. 684; Mowatt v. Carow, 32 D. 641; Phillips v. Beall, 33 D. 518; and see Jackson v. Staats, 6 D. 376.

Grandchildren will be deemed comprehended in the term children: 1. Where it is necessary to give the will any meaning; 2. When other words in the will show that the testator did not use the word children in its ordinary or limited sense. Scott v. Nelson, 29 D. 266.

Under a devise to "children," grandchildren may take if there are no children, Ewing v. Handley, 14 D. 140. But not where there are children. Presley v. Davis, 62 D. 396.

A direction in a will to distribute among the testator's children and grandchildren does not include great-grandchildren. Cummings v. Plummer, 48 R. 167.

A testator bequeathed two thousand pounds "to the children and grandchildren of his brother, I. P., deceased, excepting M. F. (a grandchild of I. P.) and her children, she and they not needing it, to be equally divided among those of them who may be then living (at the death of the testator's widow), saving that his cousin, S. R., should have two shares thereof." Held, that the great grandchildren of I. P. took equally with the children and grandchildren; and that all who were alive at the death of the testator's widow, whether born before or after the testator's death, were entitled to take. Pemberton v. Parke, 6 D. 432.

B., by his last will, gave his property to his wife for life, and, at her death, to be equally divided between his children. He then stated that certain of his children had received specified advances, and that his son "Turner, in his life-time," had received one thousand four hundred dollars, and directed that these advances be accounted for before any distribution be made. Held, that a grandchild, who was a son of the deceased Turner, was entitled to receive a share as one of the children. Scott v. Nelson, 29 D. 266.

3. Posthumous children.—A devise in general terms to the testator's "children," does not comprehend a posthumous child, so as to prevent it from claiming under the statute as a child pretermitted by the will. Armistead v. Dangerfield, 5 D. 501.

Under a residuary clause of "all my estate, real and personal, to be equally divided between my grandchildren," a posthumous grandchild, en ventre sa mere at the time of the testator's death, takes equally with the other grandchildren. Smart v. King, 33 D. 137; Barker v. Pearce, 72 D. 691. Compare Biggs v. McCarty, 44 R. 320; Byrnes v. Stilwell, 57 R. 760.

4. Illegitimate children.—The word "children" imports legitimate children in a devise, and can be explained or enlarged so as to include illegitimate children only by clear expression or necessary implication on the face of the will itself. Shearman v. Angel, 23 D. 166.

Under a devise to "children," without any other designation, illegitimate children cannot take along with legitimate. Ib.

Under a devise by an illegitimate son to his "mother," for life and to "her children," an illegitimate sister of the testator cannot take where the mother has also legitimate children, although the testator gives a bequest to his sister in another part of the will describing her as his "dear sister." Ib.

The illegitimate son of a woman takes equally with her legitimate children under a devise from her father to her for life, and at her death the property to be equally divided among her children. Bennett v. Toler, 78 D. 638.

80. Interpretation of the terms "heirs" or "heirs of the body."—1. In general.—The legal force of the word "heirs" in a will, may be controlled by the context evincing such a demonstrative intention to misapply it as cannot be mistaken; in an executed conveyance, never. Hileman v. Bouslaugh, 53 D. 474.

The word "heirs," in a bequest of personality, means those who are entitled to take under the statute of distributions. Brothers v. Cartwright, 64 D. 563.

A limitation in a will of a life estate to testator's wife, to the effect that if she shall have an heir at the time of her death, the estate shall descend to that heir, is a limitation in favor of any child which the wife may have, either by the then existing or any subsequent marriage, the word "heir" in the connection in which used in this case evidently not being employed in its technical sense. Ramsay v. Joyce, 37 D. 550.

2. When a word of limitation.—"Heirs" is a technical word, and always construed a word of limitation and not of purchase, according to the rule in Shelley's Case, unless controlled by other words clearly showing a contrary meaning. Kay v. Connor, 49 D. 690; Maulding v. Scott, 56 D. 298.

When terms of limitation in a will can be fairly interpreted to mean "heirs" or "heirs of the body," an estate of inheritance will be presumed to have been intended by the testator. Dodson v. Ball, 100 D. 586.

A testator devised: "I give and bequeath to the children of G. W. L., provided he has any, if not, to the heirs of my sister S., the land which lies between the road, etc.," and it did not appear from the will that the testator knew of his sister S. being alive. Held, that the word "heirs" must be taken in its legal acceptance, and not as descriptio personarum. Den v. Barnes, 6 D. 547.

3. When a word of purchase.—The word "heirs" is a word of purchase wherever a devise of an estate to "heirs" is not preceded by any prior estate of freehold devised to their ancestors, which may be expanded into an estate of inheritance by the estate left the "heirs." Ward v. Stow, 27 D. 238.

The word "heirs" is a term of purchase, and not of limitation; and the intention prevails against a strict construction to the contrary, whenever words of explanation are annexed indicating that the testator or grantor meant to use the term in a qualified sense, as a mere descriptio personarum, and that they and not the ancestor were to be the points from which the succession was to emanate. Ware v. Richardson, 56 D. 762.

The word "heir" or "heirs" is nomen collectivum, not a word of purchase, and carries the land not only to the immediate heir, but to all those who descend from that devisee. Roach v. Martin, 27 D. 746.

Words "legal heirs" are not converted from words of limitation to words of purchase by any expressions in a deed, which, after granting a life estate, provides that "from and immediately after the death of the said E., then to, and for the use and benefit of, the legal heirs and representatives of the said E., and to and for no other intent and purpose." Ware v. Richardson, 56 D. 762.

4. Devise to heirs of living person.—A devise to M.'s "heirs" conveys no property, unless M. dies before the testator, for "no one can be an heir during the life of his ancestor." Clark v. Mosely, 44 D. 229.

One may take as purchaser by the description of "heir" in a will, while his ancestor is living, if such appears to have been the intent of the testator. Heard v. Horton, 43 D. 659.

A devise to "heirs" of a living person, not referred to in the will as living, is void; but if the ancestor is spoken of in the will as living, or is recognized as living, by a legacy being given to him or otherwise, the devise is good, and the children or other heirs apparent of the ancestor take by purchase. Id.

5. Widow or surviving husband are not "heirs."—A widow is not the "heir" of her husband within the ordinary meaning of a will. Dodge's Appeal, 51 R. 519; Lord v. Bourne, 18 R. 234; Ivins' Appeal, 51 R. 516; Wilkins v. Ordway, 47 R. 215.

6. Meaning of "heirs of the body."—The words "natural heirs" and "heirs of the body" in a will, are considered as of the same legal import. Smith v. Pendell, 48 D. 146.

A limitation to heirs of the body, or issue, and to their heirs, constitutes them purchasers, as it shows an intention to give them an estate, not inheritable from the first taker, but an original estate inheritable from themselves as a new stock of descent. Myers v. Anderson, 47 D. 537.

Certain real property was conveyed to a trustee for the benefit of B., the trustee to convey the same to such person as B. by her last will should appoint, which person should take the same in fee, and in default of her appointment it should be conveyed to the children of B. B. by will gave the use of the property to H. during life, "the reversion and fee thereof to the heirs" of her body at and after her decease. Held, that the words, "heirs of her body," were to be taken as words of description and not of limitation, and a decree sustaining the devise was affirmed. Butler v. Huestis, 18 R. 589.

81. Word "and," when read "or."—"And" may be construed to mean "or," when it is necessary to carry out the testator's intention. Sayward v. Sayward, 22 D. 191.

The conversion of "or" into "and," or of "and" into "or," is allowed for the benefit of an ulterior devisee as well as for the benefit of the first devisee or his issue. Janney v. Sprigg, 48 D. 557.

"And" will be construed to mean "or" where a testatrix devises property to her niece with a limitation over in case she should "die unmarried and without issue;" and this expression will be held to mean "unmarried or without issue," the intention of the testatrix being apparent from the face of the will. Id.

"Or" will be construed to mean "and" where a testatrix devised to her niece, with the limitation that "should she die leaving children, and such child or children die before the age of twenty-one years, or without having married previous to the attainment of such age," in such a case the "or" between the words "years" and "without" will be held to mean "and," to effectuate the intention of the testatrix. Id.

A testator devised "all his estate, real and personal, to his six children, by name, to be equally divided among them, share and share alike, but if any one of them should die before arriving at full age, or without lawful issue, that then his, her, or their part should devolve upon and be equally divided among the surviving children, and their heirs and assigns forever." All the children survived the testator; four of them afterwards died, leaving issue, and the fifth, after arriving at full age, died intestate, and without lawful issue, having previously conveyed his share of the estate. Held that the word "or" was to be construed as "and," so that the devise over did not take effect, and the surviving child was not entitled to the share of the one dying without lawful issue. Jackson v. Blanshan, 5 D. 188.

82. Construction of other words and phrases. — 1. "Dying without issue." * — In a will, the words "dying without issue," or "without children," unless a different intent otherwise appears, are to be construed, whether used with regard to real or personal estate, as referring to a dying without children living at the time of the devisee's death. Holmes v. Williams, 1 D. 49.

Dying without issue in testator's life-time is meant where a testator directs his estate to be equally divided among his children, and that "if any should die," etc., without issue, then their portions are to be equally divided among the remainder of the aforesaid children, otherwise the limitation over is void for remoteness. Presley v. Davis, 62 D. 396.

The will of E. devised and bequeathed to her daughter, Minnie, all her real and personal estate, subject to the payment of certain legacies charged thereon. In case of the death of Minnie, "without issue," the property was given to the husband and a sister of the testatrix during life, and after their deaths to four brothers. The clause ended as follows: "The devise over to my husband, sister, and brothers to depend upon the contingency of my daughter Minnie dying without issue." Minnie survived the testatrix. Held, that she took a conditional fee, defeasible by her dying without leaving issue living at the time of her death; that her children, should she leave any, would inherit from her, but a conveyance by her would be effectual against them, and carry an indefeasible title in fee, and that the contingent expectant estate, limited to the husband, sister, and brothers, would be cut off by their joining with her in the conveyance. Matter of New York etc. R'y Co., 59 R. 478.

2. "Estate." — The word "estate" in a will carries everything, unless restrained by particular expressions. Turbett v. Turbett, 2 D. 269.

The word "estate" in a will is sufficient to pass a fee in land. Jackson v. Merrill, 5 D. 213.

* Construction of term "dying without issue," see note 55 R. 774-782.

The word "estate" standing by itself carries a fee, but it is not a word of art, but of interpretation, and its meaning is affected by other clauses and dispositions in the will. Zimmerman v. Anders, 40 D. 552.

A devise of the remainder of testator's "estate" operates as a devise of the realty. Palmer v. Dougherty, 54 D. 636.

"Estate" has a broader signification than "property"; the former includes choses in action, the latter does not, and in reference to personalty is confined to goods and chattels. Pippin v. Ellison, 55 D. 403.

Where a testator, after bequests of negroes and other personal property to several of his children, devised as follows: "Item, the rest of my estate, negroes, stock, and house furniture, to be equally divided between my wife, M. H., my son, H. H., and my daughter, R. H." Held, that the word "estate" comprehended all the testator could dispose of, both real and personal property. Mably v. Stainbach, 1 D. 545.

3. "Goods or movables." — The words, "goods or movables" in a will may include bonds, unless there is something in the context of the whole will to restrain the construction. Jackson v. Robinson, 1 D. 293.

4. "In case." — The words, "in case," when used in a will, create a condition as clearly as where the words, "if," "upon," and the like, are used. Roberts' Appeal, 98 D. 312.

5. "Issue." — The word "issue" in a will is sometimes a word of limitation and sometimes of purchase, depending on the context. Lyles v. Digges, 14 D. 281.

"Issue" is primarily a word of limitation. Kay v. Scates, 78 D. 399.

A devise to "the male issue then living of testator's son," includes all male lineal descendants of that son then living, whether of the same generation or not, and whether tracing descent through males or through females. Wistar v. Scott, 51 R. 197.

6. "Legacy." — The word "legacy" in a subsequent item of a will covers all of several bequests in a former item, where a testator in a single item gives his wife a sum of money, various articles of personal property, and a life estate in certain realty, with the privilege of taking a sum of money in lieu of the life estate, and in a subsequent item declares that the "legacy" given to his wife was in lieu of dower. Clayton v. Akin, 95 D. 393.

7. "Leaving no issue of his body." — In a devise of lands, the use of the words, "leaving no issue of his body," indicates an indefinite failure of issue. Kay v. Scates, 78 D. 399.

8. "Money." — The testator having devised to his wife "all the rest, residue, and remainder of the moneys belonging to his estate at the time of his decease," — held, the word "moneys" must be taken in its ordinary signification, and could not include bonds, mortgages, or other choses in action, as there was nothing in the will showing that the testator intended to use the term in any other than its ordinary sense. Mann v. Mann, 7 D. 416.

A testator, after giving various legacies, gave "the balance of my money" to his mother. Held, a gift of all the residue of his estate, both real and personal. In re Miller, 17 R. 422.

9. "Next of kin." — A will directed that the testator's residuary estate should be divided "among my next of kin according to the statute of the State of New York concerning the distribution of personal estate of intestates, in like manner as though I had died intestate." At the time of its execution the testator was unmarried, but he married subsequently. Held, that as there was nothing in the context to show a different intent, the words "next of kin" must be construed in their ordinary meaning of relatives in blood, and did not include the widow. Keteltas v. Keteltas, 28 R. 155.

A testator provided that if any of certain legatees "shall die before my decease, I give the sums, which I have given to them respectively, respectively to those persons living at the time of my decease, who shall then be next of kin respectively of those of them whom I may survive." One of these legatees died in the life-time of the testator, leaving as his nearest relatives a brother and three nephews, sons of a deceased brother, all of whom survived the testator. Held, that the brother of the legatee was entitled, to the exclusion of the nephews. Swasey v. Jaques, 59 R. 65.

10. "Reasonable and competent support." — What is a "reasonable and competent support," as provided for in a will, does not mean merely the food and clothing necessary to sustain life, but a support in the place and manner in which a party has been accustomed to live. Ellerbe v. Ellerbe, 40 D. 623.

A bequest for reasonable and competent support does not take effect when the party in whose favor the bequest is made has sufficient property for her own support. Ib.

A parent cannot claim an allowance for the support of her child when she has sufficient means to support him, although a will provides that she and her child have a reasonable and competent support out of the proceeds of the estate. Ib.

11. "Religious." — In a will means "Christian." Simpson v. Welcome, 39 R. 349.

12. "Survivors," will be construed to mean personal representatives, where a testator, unfamiliar with the use of legal terms, makes a bequest to his brother and sisters by name, or their survivors. Stoner's Appeal, 45 D. 608.

The term "survivors," restricts "dying without issue" to lives in being, and twenty-one years thereafter, where a benefit to persons in life not transmissible to heirs and representatives is plainly intended, but the words "remainder of the aforesaid children" are not equivalent to the term "survivors." Presley v. Davis, 62 D. 396.

Words of survivorship should be referred to the period for the payment or distribution of the subject-matter of the gift. Sinton v. Boyd, 2 R. 369.

A testator gave all his estate to his wife for life, with a direction that after her death it should be equally divided among his children or the survivors of them. One of the children died after the testator's death, but before that of the widow, leaving a child. Held, that no interest vested in the deceased child under the will, nor in the grandchild, she being neither one of the "children" nor "survivors." Ib.

2. The Residuary Clause.

88. What will fall into the residuum, generally. — The general residuary clause must include all the residue from all sources, and if the balance mentioned be confined to what is left of a particular fund, it is special only. Mahorner v. Hooe, 48 D. 706.

Testator's intention to create different grades in his benefactions is clearly shown by his creating a residuum upon a residuum. Gallego v. Atty-General, 24 D. 650.

A residuary bequest generally operates upon all the personal estate of which the testator is possessed at the time of his death. Donohoo v. Lea, 55 D. 725.

A bequest of the "remainder of my personal estate, not hereinbefore nor hereinafter specified, etc., excepting what is herein reserved and bequeathed," carries the principal of a sum which in a previous part of the will is directed to be put at interest for the benefit of the testator's widow for life, where such principal is not otherwise disposed of, directly or by implication, and the whole tenor of the will indicates that the testator's intention was to bequeath his entire estate. Nyce's Estate, 40 D. 498.

The Indiana statute, that every devise of all testator's real estate shall pass all the real estate he may be entitled to devise at his death, does not apply to a residuary clause in a will where particular pieces of property are devised to particular devisees, but only to cases where the will purports to devise all the property equally or in proportions, to all the devisees named in it. Bowen v. Johnson, 61 D. 110.

Surplus income from testator's crops passes to the residuary legatee after the payment of the testator's debts and an annuity with which they are charged, although the will directs that after the death of the annuitant the corpus be sold and the proceeds divided among other legatees. Drayton v. Rose, 64 D. 731.

The words, "not otherwise disposed of in this will," do not have effect of restricting the devise to a particular residue. These words do not express any other intention than that which is necessarily implied in every residuary devise, and they must be construed with reference to the well-established rule that a residuary bequest of personal estate carries not only everything not disposed of, but everything that, in the event, turns out not to be disposed of. Cunningham v. Cunningham, 68 D. 718.

84. What will not. — In a general devise of lands, without limitation or restriction, the reversion will not pass under a general residuary clause, but descends to the heir. Kennon v. McRoberts, 1 D. 428.

The statutory provision as to advancements has no just application, where the testator distributes his property with the intention of disposing of it all, but inadvertently leaves a residuum by omitting to put any residuary clause in his will. Needles v. Needles, 70 D. 85.

If, under the disposition of a residuum of personal estate by will in two parts, the first disposition be invalid, the sum which it was the purpose thereby to dispose of does not go to the legatee of the other part, but to the next of kin of decedent. Beekman v. Benson, 80 D. 269.

Lands devised specifically to a wife and children do not come within the operation of a residuary clause in a will providing that certain tracts of land shall pass to the executor in trust to be sold, and the proceeds divided between the wife and children, and directing the executor "to keep my estate together, and not to hand over any of the devises or legacies," until the happening of a certain event. As to the land specifically devised, the words "not to hand over" have no application whatever. Patton v. Patton, 86 D. 448.

Where a residuary fund is given to the children, nominatim, by the testator, or where it is given to a certain number of the children to be equally divided between them, if one of them die before the testator, his or her share will lapse, but will not fall into the residue for the benefit of the others. Such lapsed residuary share must be distributed among the next of kin of the testator. Winston v. Webb, 93 D. 599.

Where there is a devise for life of land subject to a lease made by the testator, dying during the term, before any rent accrues, the rent goes to the reversioner, and is not carried by a bequest of all the testator's personalty, including notes and accounts. Watson v. Penn, 58 R. 26.

A testator seised of three tracts of land, and entitled to the equity of redemption in a fourth, made his will, and directed, in the first place, that all his just debts should be paid. He then devised to his eldest son all his lands at O. and F., with some negroes and stocks. To his other son, all his lands at C., with other negroes and stocks. To his wife and daughter he gave all the rest of his estate, real and personal, saving one negro, by name given to his second son, but no words of inheritance were annexed to any of the devises. Held, the inheritance in the land devised to the heir descended upon him, and did not pass under the residuary clause. Kannon v. McRoberts, 1 D. 428.

85. Lapsed or void devises and bequests. — Where the will is so obscure that the court cannot discern the intention of the testator, the legacy fails, and the property will pass under the residuary clause. Rothmahler v. Myers, 6 D. 613; Clark v. Cotton, 24 D. 279.

A residuary legatee takes lapsed and void legacies, as where a legacy is given to one who has no existence. Helms v. Franciscus, 20 D. 402; Bendall v. Bendall, 60 D. 469.

A bequest of the residue comprehends all the personalty not otherwise disposed of by the will, whether it fall in by the lapse of a legacy or from some particular gift's being illegal and void, unless a contrary intention on the part of the testator clearly appears from the will. Sorrey v. Bright, 28 D. 584.

An illegal bequest or devise defeats all dependent bequests subsidiary to and inseparable from it, though they might otherwise be valid. Mahorner v. Hooe, 48 D. 706.

Where specific legatees and residuary ones are the same persons taking under a will containing a general residuary clause, and where the specific legacies have lapsed, the rule applies that where one of several residuary legatees who are to take in common dies before the testator, his portion does not survive to his co-legatees, but goes to the next of kin according to the statute of distribution. Bendall v. Bendall, 60 D. 469.

Where testator bequeaths one-third of his personal estate to his wife, and the other two-thirds to residuary legatees, and the bequest to the wife lapses by her death before the death of the testator, the personal property bequeathed to the wife becomes a part of the residuum, and passes to the residuary legatees. Cunningham v. Cunningham, 68 D. 718.

The object of section 20, chapter 106, revised statutes of Kentucky, was to alter the legal effect of a residuary devise, so that where a legacy should lapse it should not belong, as theretofore, to the general residuary devisee, but should pass as in case of intestacy. That section was not designed merely to fix a rule of construction. Id.

Devises of real estate and legacies of personal estate have been placed upon substantially the same footing in Massachusetts, as to the extent of the power to devise and the formalities required in the execution of a testamentary instrument. And both a lapsed devise of real estate and a lapsed legacy of personal estate will pass under a general residuary clause in the will, unless a clear intention to the contrary is shown by the will. Thayer v. Wellington, 85 D. 753.

A testator devised all his real estate to his nephews, A, B, and C, "to be equally divided between them, to be held by them, their heirs, and assigns forever," subject to a charge. There was no other or residuary devise of real estate in the will. A was dead, and the testator knew it when the will was made. Held, that the devise to him was a void and not a lapsed devise, and that the one-third descended as intestate real estate to the heirs at law of the testator. Hearn v. Cannon, 15 R. 701.

86. Effect of omission to provide for child.*—A pretermitted child is entitled to the same share of the father's estate that he would have had if there had been no will. Woodard v. Spiller, 25 D. 139.

Exclusion of kin in a will will not be operative against them, unless there is a valid disposition of the property. Blackman v. Gordon, 44 D. 241.

Where a testator makes such an allusion to a child as to show that he had not forgotten to consider such child in the distribution of his estate, it will be sufficient to exclude such child from a distributive share in the estate of the testator, and it is not necessary that the child should have a legacy in the will. Terry v. Foster, 2 D. 6.

A posthumous child, unprovided for by settlement and pretermitted by will, is entitled to a share of the real estate, notwithstanding such child be a daughter, and it appears from the will that the testator intended to give all his lands to his sons. Such child is entitled to such share of the real and personal estate as it would have been entitled to if the father had died intestate; including profits of lands, hire of negroes, and interests and profits of other personal estate. Armistead v. Dangerfield, 5 D. 501.

The portion of such posthumous child is not to be raised by a division of the estate into equal parts, but by a proportionable contribution by the devisees and legatees and those claiming under them. Ib.

Parol evidence that testator intentionally omitted a grandchild from his will is admissible, under the Massachusetts revised statutes, to exclude the claim of such grandchild to a share of the estate. Wilson v. Fosket, 39 D. 736.

A testator failing to provide for one of his children in his will, will not prevent its being approved, though it does not appear that the omission was intentional. Doane v. Lake, 52 D. 654.

The remedy of a child omitted in the will is by having it modified after probate so far as may be requisite for securing it such rights as it may be able to prove. Ib.

Rights of heirs not provided for by will are governed by the law in force at the testator's death, and not by the law in force at the time of the execution of the will. Lorieux v. Keller, 68 D. 696.

Declarations of testator at the time of executing his will are admissible to show that children not mentioned in the will have already been provided for, and that such omission was intentional, and not the result of accident or mistake. Ib.

Extrinsic evidence, either written or parol, declarations of testator at the time of executing the will, or any act, circumstances, or admission of the testator which will go to show that children omitted from the will have received their portion of the estate, or that the testator intended to pass them by, is admissible for this purpose. Ib.

A child and heir-at-law of a testator, for whom his father has by mistake failed to provide by the will, but who, being of full age, has appeared in proceedings resulting in a judgment establishing the will, cannot recover land thereby devised. Newman v. Waterman, 53 R. 310.

A statute provided that children of a testator, when born subsequently to the making of the will, and not provided for therein, should take as if there were no will, unless the omission to provide was intentional, and not occasioned by accident or mistake. A testatrix by ante-nuptial agreement had reserved to her sole use certain real estate and the right to dispose of it by will. Nine months after marriage she willed all her estate to her husband, making no provision for her children subsequently to be born. One month later she bore a child. Held, that the evidence justified a finding that the omission was intentional, and not occasioned by mistake or accident. Peters v. Siders, 30 R. 671.

A statute provides that a testator, leaving a child or children not "named nor provided for" in his will, shall be deemed intestate as to such child or children. A testatrix left a will not in itself expressly naming nor providing for her children, but referring to and adopting provisions in her late husband's will, which named and provided for them. Held, that this was equivalent to naming and providing for them in her own will. Gerrish v. Gerrish, 34 R. 585.

87. Rights of residuary devisee or legatee.—A testator bequeathed to his wife certain slaves during her natural life, and after specific devises of lands and slaves to his two sons, devised as follows: "All the rest of my estate I leave at the time of my death, I desire may be equally divided between my beloved wife and my dear sons, and their heirs forever." This residuary clause vested in the wife and sons equally the reversion in the slaves given to her for life; and, therefore, on her remarriage, her husband became entitled absolutely to one-third of those slaves, and their increase. Read v. Payne, 2 D. 550.

A devise of all the rest and residue of the real estate of the testator will pass the rents and profits from his death to the time the estate is vested; and whoever takes the legal estate in the meantime will be liable for the profits as well as the estate itself; for the rents and profits, as well as the estate itself, may be given by way of executory devise. Royers v. Ross, 8 D. 575.

An allotment of real estate, made by commissioners appointed under a will, passes to the residuary legatees the legal title to such portions of the realty as are to them respectively assigned. Baynard v. Norris, 46 D. 647.

The unexhausted residuum goes to the heir like undisposed-of real estate, where lands are devised upon trust for a particular purpose, and there is a balance left or the trust fails. Mahorner v. Hooe, 48 D. 706.

A residuary legatee was entitled to whatever personal estate fell into the residue, after the making of the will, by lapse, invalid disposition, or other accident, under the law of Kentucky as it stood before the revised statutes took effect. The law as to real estate was different. Cunningham v. Cunningham, 68 D. 718.

Shipping, included in a general residuary bequest to one for life, with remainder over, should be converted into money, and together with the profits of the shipping arising during the settlement of the estate, after paying the tenant for life a proper amount of interest on the sum, should be invested by the executors in permanent securities, for the benefit of the remainderman, giving the tenant for life the income arising therefrom. Healey v. Toppan, 86 D. 159.

An absolute power of disposal in the first taker renders a subsequent limitation repugnant and void. Thus, where the testator, after making sundry bequests, proceeds as follows: "And as to the residue of my estate after payment of my just debts, I give and bequeath the same to my beloved wife. * * * And lastly, I further direct if there be any of my said estate left after the decease of my said wife, then the said property left be equally divided between G. and T." Held, that the residue of his estate after the payment of his just debts and legacies vested absolutely in his wife. Jones v. Bacon, 28 R. 1.

A testator, by the first item of his will, devised to his wife real property exceeding in value a life estate in all his property of that character. In the residuary clause of said will he devised as follows: "I give, devise, and bequeath all my other property of every description to my beloved wife and dear children, to be divided among them according to law." Held, that a farm included in such residuary clause passed to the wife and children as tenants in common of the fee, and that the wife was not limited to dower therein. Pruden v. Paxton, 28 R. 333.

A will created an estate for life in the residue with remainder over. Shortly before death the testator formed a partnership, to be carried on for three years, even if he should die sooner. Held, that the profits went to the life tenant as income. Heighe v. Littig, 52 R. 510.

3. The Doctrine of Equitable Conversion.

§§. General rule. — Money or land is considered in equity as that species of property into which it is directed to be converted, where money is directed to be employed in the purchase of land, or land is directed to be sold and converted into money, and this in whatever manner the direction is given. Collins v. Champ, 61 D. 179.

A mortgagee may convert the mortgage into real estate as between his real and personal representatives, by declaring his intention so to do; and such intention is effectually manifested by devising the lands mortgaged to one and his heirs and assigns. Chase v. Lockerman, 35 D. 277.

Where the testator, after having devised in trust, provides as follows: "Should my views in the above first article of this will be disappointed, so that judicially or otherwise a sale should take place of said City Hotel buildings and grounds during the life of my children, it is my will and I direct that my trustees, or any court of equity, shall cause the proceeds of sale to be invested in mortgage or ground-rents, or in debt of the United States, or of the city of Baltimore; and that, subject to the payment of one-third of the income of the investment to my wife during her life, the said investment shall be for the benefit of my children during their lives, and after their death shall be the property, for the shares of the decedents, of their respective children or descendants, per stirpes; the children or descendants of such of my children as shall have died before the investment, taking as their absolute property, and per stirpes, the shares to which, if they had lived, the deceased would have been entitled," — held, that as equity treats as done that which ought to be done, if upon the failure of the first article, parties became entitled to the proceeds of sale when effected, they would have a right to resort to a court of equity for a sale which would produce those proceeds; and that in substance the will is the same as if it directed a sale to take place in case the views in the first artide could not be carried out. Barnum v. Barnum, 90 D. 88.

89. Effect of express direction to sell. — Equitable conversion of realty into personalty occurs where a testator devises his realty to his executors in trust to sell and to apply the proceeds to certain uses, and the property becomes personalty immediately upon the testator's death, for all the purposes of the disposition, as effectually as if the testator had himself sold the land and bequeathed the proceeds in the same way. Kane v. Gott, 35 D. 641. S. P., Proctor v. Ferebee, 36 D. 34; Tazewell v. Smith, 10 D. 533; Bramhall v. Ferris, 67 D. 113.

Where a testator directs his real estate to be sold, and the money arising therefrom to be paid to particular persons, the interest of the legatees is a vested one, as much as if the land itself had been devised, although the executor may have a discretion as to the time of selling, and although the estate to be sold is only a remainder. Tazewell v. Smith, 10 D. 533.

The death of the devisee of such vested interest, before sale, will not defeat the interest, unless so provided in the will. Ib.

Where land is directed to be sold on a certain condition, it is not thereby converted into personal estate; but, if a valid sale is made, the surplus proceeds must be treated as personalty. Evans v. Kingsberry, 14 D. 779.

Equity considers as money lands directed in a will to be sold and converted into money; and where a testator directs his executors to sell all his real and personal property, and pay over the proceeds to his son's guardians, whom he directs to use the interest for the support and education of his son, and to pay to him the principal on his attaining his majority, such realty will be considered as having been, by the directions of the will, converted into money, although it was never sold by the executors. Burr v. Sim, 29 D. 48.

Said son may, on attaining his majority, elect to treat the real estate unsold as land, and the fact that he thereafter devises it as such, is proof of his determination so to reconvert it. Ib.

By making such election, he takes as a purchaser, and not by inheritance, and any portion of such estate undisposed of by him goes, under the act of 1794, to his heirs on the maternal as well as to those on the paternal side. Ib.

A devise of such real estate by him without words of inheritance passes a life estate only. Ib.

Land is regarded as money when devised to trustees to be sold, and the proceeds applied to the use of one for life, and afterwards distributed among certain parties in remainder, and a remainderman, before an election to take the devise as land, has no interest in the land which will enable him to defeat the operation of the statute of limitations in favor of one in adverse possession under a conveyance from one of the trustees, and a subsequent election does not affect the purchaser. Smilie v. Biffle, 44 D. 156.

A devise must be treated as of money and not of land, when by the provisions of a will real estate was to be converted into money, and that money distributed among the devisees; nor does it make any difference in this respect that the legal title descended to the devisees to whom the money is to be paid when the land is sold. Baker v. Copenbarger, 58 D. 600.

Money directed to be employed in the purchase of land, and land directed to be sold and turned into money, are to be considered as that species of property into which they are directed to be converted. Rankin v. Rankin, 87 D. 205.

90. Effect of mere discretionary power to sell. — A devise in which the testator simply directs land to be sold by his executors, and the proceeds applied to the payment of his debts, conveys to the executors a mere power to sell, and the fee passes to the heir, to become divested whenever the power is exercised. Ware v. Murph, 33 D. 97.

91. Time at which conversion takes effect. — Land directed by testator to be sold upon the happening of a certain event, the proceeds to be divided among his children and their heirs, becomes personal estate upon the happening of that event; the division of the proceeds is then to take place, and must be among those of his children who were then living, and the heirs of those who were then dead. Brothers v. Cartwright, 64 D. 563.

Land directed by will to be sold immediately, and proceeds to be then divided, is personal estate from the testator's decease. Ib.

VI. CONTESTING A WILL FOR INCAPACITY OR UNDUE INFLUENCE.

92. Jurisdictional questions. — Equity will not set aside a will on a suggestion of fraud or imposition on the testator in procuring him to make it. Lyne v. Guardian, 13 D. 509.

Chancery cannot set aside a will or codicil as to real estate on the ground of fraud or incompetency of the testator. The question should be determined in a court of law on an issue from chancery of devisavit vel non. Rogers v. Rogers, 20 D. 716.

Chancery has no jurisdiction to try the validity of a will of personalty, except upon an appeal from the surrogate. Colton v. Ross, 22 D. 648.

The validity of a will of realty may be decided upon in chancery, where it comes in question collaterally; but if the heir insists upon its invalidity in his answer, an issue is awarded to try the question at law. Ib.

The heir cannot file a bill to set aside a will on the ground of the testator's incompetency, if objection is made at the proper stage of the suit. Ib.

If the defendant does not object to the jurisdiction in such a case, the court may award an issue deviseavit vel non, and upon the finding of the jury, pronounce the will invalid. Ib.

Courts of chancery in England have no power to determine the validity of a will of either real or personal property. Their comprehensive jurisdiction to set aside other fraudulent instruments does not extend to wills obtained by fraud. State v. McGlynn, 81 D. 118.

Surrogates, having exclusive jurisdiction of the proof of wills of personalty, must necessarily determine all questions of fraud, imposition, undue influence, and testamentary capacity, in the case of such a will. Clark v. Fisher, 19 D. 402.

93. Right of action.—A widow cannot maintain a suit to set aside her husband's will while retaining the personal property taken by her under the will, which was in excess of the amount to which she was entitled under the law. Ratliff v. Baldwin, 92 D. 330.

One who receives a legacy under a will is estopped from contesting the validity of the will, without repaying the amount of the legacy or bringing the money into court. Holt v. Rice, 21 R. 138.

94. The proper parties.—Proceedings establishing or annulling wills are in rem, and bind the whole world. All persons interested may become parties and present proofs, either for or against the establishment or annulment of the will. Wells v. Wells, 16 D. 150.

95. Rules of pleading and evidence, generally.*—A petition to set aside a will should contain all the grounds necessary to effect that purpose, and other points brought out on the trial by proof should not be submitted by the judge to the jury. Vickery v. Hobbs, 78 D. 238.

In a proceeding impeaching the validity of a will, it is improper to render final judgment on a demurrer to the answer. Whether the writing in question is the last will and testament of the party, is a question which must be tried by a jury. Walker v. Walker, 82 D. 474.

A canceled will, written by the testator, and found among his papers, made when his mind was sound, and he was not assailed by intrigue, may be given in evidence to show his intentions as to the disposition of his property, and also to show his manner of canceling a will which he meant to annul, where a subsequent will is impeached on the ground of fraud or of the testator's incapacity. Irish v. Smith, 11 D. 648.

The certificate of oaths of witnesses at the probate of the will may be offered in evidence by either party, in the trial of an issue out of chancery to determine the validity and execution of a will, but it is to receive such weight only as the jury may think it deserves, in connection with the other proof in the case, for such trial is de novo, without regard to the fact of previous probate. Rigg v. Wilton, 54 D. 419.

As to sanity or capacity of testator, no particular quantum of evidence is necessary on the trial of an issue out of chancery, but the jury hear the proofs of the parties and decide the issue like any other question of fact, according to the weight of the evidence. Ib.

Evidence dehors the will, that it was made under a mistake as to the supposed death of the son of the testatrix, whose name was omitted therefrom, is inadmissible to impeach the will, but the mistake must appear on the face of the will, and it must also appear what the will would have been but for the mistake. Gifford v. Dyer, 57 D. 708.

In a suit to contest the validity of a will, the contestees offered in evidence the alleged will, with the order of the court admitting it to probate, and rested their case. The contestant then concluded his testimony impeaching the validity of the will, after which the contestees were permitted to introduce general evidence against the objection of the contestant, sustaining the will. Held, that the evidence was properly admitted. Runyan v. Price, 86 D. 459.

96. What constitutes incapacity.—The best form in which the question of testamentary capacity can be stated to the jury is, whether the testator's mind and memory were sufficiently sound to enable him to know and understand the business in which he was engaged at the time he executed the will; and in determining the question the competency of the mind should be judged of by the nature of the act to be done, from a consideration of all the circumstances of the case. Rules of testamentary capacity criticised. Irish v. Newell, 14 R. 79.

If there be partial insanity only, and the will is the direct offspring of it, it will be invalid, although the general capacity be unimpeached. Potts v. House, 50 D. 329; Cotton v. Ulmer, 6 R. 703.

A will is invalidated by delusion, where it is the result of the delusion, but not otherwise, as a general rule. Lucas v. Parsons, 71 D. 147.

Belief that one is tormented by witches, devils, or evil spirits, is not sufficient evidence of insanity, when the person is otherwise capable of managing his business, particularly when it appears that he was most troubled with these hallucinations when he was drinking. Lee v. Lee, 17 D. 722.

Aversion to relations is not evidence of insanity where ill treatment is assigned as a reason for it, and there are grounds for believing it well founded. Ib.

Singularity should not be confounded with insanity, nor a weakened intellect mistaken for one that is lost, in determining the question of testamentary capacity. Kinne v. Kinne, 21 D. 732.

Eccentricity, however great, is not sufficient, of itself, to invalidate a will; neither is the greatest singularity, nor extreme old age, nor being deaf and dumb, whether so from infancy, or by misfortune superinduced by subsequent cause. Potts v. House, 50 D. 329; Lee v. Lee, 17 D. 722.

Belief in witchcraft is not of itself evidence of such insanity as disables a person to make a will. Addington v. Wilson, 61 D. 81.

Resentment of a testator against a son not amounting to delusion will not vitiate a will prejudicial to the son, made in accordance with previously declared intentions. Lucas v. Parsons, 71 D. 147.

In the contest of a will, the judge charged that "unless the jury believe from the evidence that the testator, if of sound mind, would have included C. or his children in the benefit of his will, they cannot set the will aside because he may have excluded them under an insane delusion as to C." Held, error, on the ground that when a will is ascertained to be the result of an insane delusion it should be declared void, without inquiring what the testator would or would not have done if he had been of sound mind. Cotton v. Ulmer, 6 R. 703.

W. was, by a stroke of paralysis, rendered unconscious and incapable of mental action. Four months afterwards he made a will. Held, not a presumption of law that his unsoundness of mind continued until after the making of the will. Irish v. Newell, 14 R. 79.

97. And how proved. — To impeach a will evidence may be received which goes to show that the testator had a paralytic stroke some time before its execution, by which his intellect was impaired, and so continued to the making of the will and afterwards. Irish v. Smith, 11 D. 648.

A statement made in the testator's presence, by his wife, "that he did not attend to business, that he was incapable," to which he said nothing, is admissible in evidence. Ib.

Book entries made by the testator may be evidence in favor of his sanity, but not conclusive, and the jury must determine its weight. Ib.

Inferences of mental infirmity from conversations with the testator cannot be drawn without disclosing to the jury the nature of the conversations. Ib.

Incapacity to make a will may be inferred by the jury from facts anterior and subsequent to its execution, where there is no evidence of such infirmity at the time of execution, and the subscribing witnesses are uncontradicted. Ib.

The testimony of the subscribing witnesses to a will is not conclusive as to the sanity or insanity of the testator. Howard's Will, 17 D. 60.

To invalidate a will there must be extrinsic proof of insanity existing at its execution, or the act must be so irrational as to afford intrinsic evidence of it. Lee v. Lee, 17 D. 722.

The number, character, and intelligence of witnesses, and their opportunities for observation, should be taken into the account upon a question of insanity. Ib.

Mere decay of testatrix's faculties, occasioned by extreme age, is not sufficient evidence of the want of a disposing mind, where her mind was always rational, and, when it acted, consistent and intelligent. Higdon's Will, 22 D. 84.

Incapacity may be established by proof of conversation, acts, or declarations of the testator inconsistent with sanity, or by all of them taken together. Davis v. Calvert, 25 D. 282.

The contents and manner of execution of a will, the circumstances under which it was made, the testator's situation, the condition and relative situation of the legatees and devisees, and of the testator's connections, their claims upon him, and the terms on which he stood with them, and the nature and extent of his estate, are all proper to go before the jury in determining the question of incapacity. Ib.

Testator's mental condition at the time of making the will determines as to his testamentary capacity; but evidence of his condition before and afterwards may be admissible to throw light on his condition at the time of execution. Terry v. Buffington, 56 D. 423.

Evidence of testator's incapacity several years after making the will is, by itself, inadmissible to impeach his will; but such evidence is admissible after proof that his condition at such subsequent time was the same as at the making of the will. Ib.

A judgment of lunacy against testator five years after making the will is, it seems, inadmissible to impeach the will, even though there is independent proof that the testator's mental condition at the date of the inquisition was the same as at the date of the will. Ib.

Declarations of testatrix tending to show importunity and undue influence, made about the time of executing the will are admissible in evidence to prove the state and condition of her mind when the will was executed, but not to prove that such undue influence and importunity were exercised. Robinson v. Hutchinson, 60 D. 293.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

To aid in determining whether the will resulted from excitement of existing intoxication, its disposing parts may be examined to ascertain whether they appear to be so extravagant and unreasonable that they cannot fairly be attributed to any other than a disordered mind. Peck v. Cary, 84 D. 220.

A testator made a will after he was found to be a lunatic with lucid intervals. Held, in a feigned issue on this will, that instructions given by him a short time before he was found lunatic, for another will, which was drawn accordingly, and which differed from that in dispute, were admissible in evidence on the question of testamentary capacity. Tillow v. Tillow, 93 D. 691.

A change of intention on part of testator in relation to his will is of no importance, if there was a sound mind unconstrained; but when the question is whether there was such a mind, such change may be adduced to aid the inquiry. Ib.

Frequent declarations made by testator within ten years before his death that he liked a brother better than his other relations can have no bearing on the question of the testator's sanity. Ib.

Declarations of a testator are admissible to show the condition of his mind; and great latitude is to be allowed in the admission of such evidence. Robinson v. Adams, 16 R. 473.

98. Burden of proof as to sanity. — The sanity of a testator is presumed until the contrary be shown by the party alleging mental unsoundness, but if mental derangement be proved, it is then incumbent on the devisee to show a lucid interval. Jackson v. Van Dusen, 4 D. 330. S. P., Case of Cochran's Will, 15 D. 116.

It is incumbent upon those who claim under a will to prove, not only its due execution, but that the testator was of sound and disposing mind, and such persons are entitled to open and close the case both in proof and argument. Comstock v. Hadlyme Ec. Soc., 20 D. 100. S. F., Gerrish v. Nason, 39 D. 589.

The onus is upon a party attacking a will when its formal execution is admitted, and it has been admitted to probate, but it is sought to set it aside on the ground of incapacity in the testator. Farrell v. Brennan, 82 D. 137. S. P., Trumbull v. Gibbons, 51 D. 253; Taylor v. Wilburn, 64 D. 186.

Every person is presumed to be of sound mind and memory, unless the contrary is proved. The burden of proof is therefore upon the party who asserts unsoundness of mind, unless a previous state of insanity is proved, in which case the burden is shifted to him who claims under the will. Higgins v. Carlton, 92 D. 666. S. P., Clark v. Fisher, 19 . 402; Tillow v. Tillow, 93 D. 691; O'Donnell v. Rodiger, 52 R. 322.

After probate of a will, sanity of testator is always presumed in favor of the will, and insanity must be proved by him that alleges it. Higgins v. Carlton, 92 D. 666. S. P., Lee v. Lee, 17 D. 722.

In order to constitute an instrument a will, the jury must be satisfied from the proof that the testatrix knew, at the time of execution of the instrument, that it was her will; the legal presumption that a party knows the import of a paper signed by him, is not sufficient. Gerrish v. Nason, 39 D. 589.

To sustain the validity of a will attacked on the ground of the insanity of the testator, it is generally sufficient to show that he was of sane mind at the time of its execution. Taylor v. Wilburn, 64 D. 186.

Where a will contains a series of wise and judicious dispositions, it is for those who attack it to prove unsoundness of mind in the testator at its execution. Chandler v. Barrett, 99 D. 701.

Where a will contains dispositions such as would cause insanity to be presumed, although susceptible of being justified by peculiar circumstances, it is for the legatee to prove the sanity of the testator as against the terms of the will. Ib.

If facts occurring near the date of a will, and preceding and following it, prove an habitual state of insanity, then, notwithstanding the wisdom of the act, the supporters of the will must prove soundness of mind in the testator during the intermediate time. Ib.

If acts of insanity on the part of the testator were rare, and occurred at periods distant from each other, and from the date of the will, it will sustain itself, and be presumed to have been made in a lucid interval, at least if the will is not destitute of good sense, and betrays no insanity. Ib.

99. Effect of unjust character of will to show incapacity. — An unjust will is not necessarily an irrational act. Lee v. Lee, 17 D. 722.

Unreasonableness of the will is proper evidence with respect to the state of the testator's mind. Clark v. Fisher, 19 D. 402.

That the dispositions of a will are imprudent, and not to be accounted for, is not sufficient of itself to avoid it, but may furnish intrinsic evidence tending to show incapacity in the testator, and throwing suspicion upon the will, as where those having the strongest natural claims upon the testator's bounty are excluded without any apparent or known cause. Davis v. Calvert, 25 D. 282; Higgins v. Carlton, 92 D. 666.

A will cannot be set aside because of the court's disapprobation of the motive that actuated the testator, or of the disposition that he makes of his property, unless there is, not merely in the motives, but in the actual disposition, something which is against good morals or against public policy. Trumbull v. Gibbons, 51 D. 253.

A person competent to make a will may disinherit his children, and his motives therefor cannot be called in question. Addington v. Wilson, 61 D. 81.

Disinheriting children is of no weight, further than as a circumstance to be considered with other evidence tending to show insanity or other mental defect. Ib.

Evidence that testator disinherited children for undutiful conduct, which he attributed to the fact of their being bewitched, is not evidence of his insanity. Ib.

The mere omission of a child by testator is not of itself sufficient to impeach his capacity to make a will. Kirkwood v. Gordon, 62 D. 418.

A person of sound mind may dispose of his property in any manner he pleases, consistent with the policy of the law, and it is not a valid objection to a will that the testator gave his property to his wife or to strangers to his blood, provided he was mentally competent and free from undue influence at the time. Higgins v. Carlton, 92 D. 666.

The jury have no right to reject the will because they think its provisions are unjust and injudicious, although its provisions may be considered by them in deciding the question of the testator's capacity or incapacity. Ib.

Neither old age, forgetfulness of family, largeness of the legacy, nor low rank of the legatee, will of themselves show insanity in the testator. Ohandler v. Barrett, 99 D. 701.

100. What constitutes fraud or undue influence—1. Fraud.—A person has a right, by fair argument and persuasion, to induce another to make a will, and even to make it in his own favor. Miller v. Miller, 8 D. 651.

A will induced by fraud, imposition, or undue influence, which makes a different disposition from that which the testator would otherwise have made, will be set aside in a court of equity. Clark v. Fisher, 19 D. 402; Davis v. Calvert, 25 D. 282.

Fraud and undue importunity are equally fatal to a will made under their influence, though they stand on different grounds. Terry v. Buffington, 56 D. 423.

But fraud or undue influence to invalidate a will must have some effect upon the testator in producing the very act of making his will. Monroe v. Barclay, 93 D. 620. But no direct or immediate act of fraud or undue influence exerted at that time need be shown. Davis v. Calvert, 25 D. 282.

Misrepresentation not producing a direct effect in influencing a bequest to the party misrepresenting will not vitiate a will. Taylor v. Kelly, 68 D. 150.

Where any part of a will was first suggested by another, it must appear that its adoption by the testator was not due to mental incapacity, fraud, or undue influence. Davis v. Calvert, 25 D. 282.

Appeals to affection, attachment, and sense of duty and obligation, accompanied by honest intercessions and modest persuasions, will not, in the case of a testator of competent, sound mind, vitiate the execution of a will; but a person of weak mind or laboring under sickness may, by false statements, subtle insinuations, and encouraged enmities against kindred, be moved to make a will which may be set aside on the ground of fraud and undue influence. Floyd v. Floyd, 49 D. 626.

A fraudulent prevention of a revocation of a will, it seems, will not afford a ground for setting it aside. Ib.

A direction by testator that his will shall be drawn, containing the condition that it shall be valid only in the event of his death during his then sickness, and void if he should recover, must be complied with and the condition inserted, and it will be held a fraud if it is not so inserted; and no subsequent declaration by the testator that he is satisfied with the will, if thus deceived, operates to make it valid. Vickery v. Hobbs, 73 D. 238.

Where a will is drawn by a legatee or other beneficiary, closer scrutiny and stricter proof will be required than under ordinary circumstances that no fraud has been committed upon the testator, and that he is fully competent to make a will. Ib.

A testator, having several children, made a will giving all his estate to his wife, except a dollar to each child; this was because there was a large judgment against one of his sons, which the father did not wish his estate to pay; the son had, in fact, compromised the judgment, but failed to inform his father; he had also urged the making of a will, but there was no proof that he induced, or that the concealment induced, the making of the will in this form. Held, that there was no ground for setting aside the will. Allmon v. Pigg, 25 R. 303.

2. Undue influence.—The influence to avoid a will must be such as to destroy the freedom of the testator's will, and must be specially directed in favor of particular parties, or such as was intended to, and did, to some extent, mislead him to make a will essentially contrary to his duty. Allmon v. Pigg, 25 R. 303; Floyd v. Floyd, 49 D. 626; Baldwin v. Parker, 96 D. 697; Taylor v. Kelly, 68 D. 150. It must be more than the influence of affection or attachment, or the mere desire of gratifying the wishes of another, and there must be satisfactory proof that the will was obtained by this coercion. Higgins v. Carlton, 92 D. 666. But moderate and reasonable solicitation, entreaty, or persuasion, though yielded to, if done intelligently and from a conviction of duty, will not vitiate a will in other respects valid. St. Leger's Appeal, 91 D. 735; Gilbert v. Gilbert, 58 D. 268. And the burden of proof is on the party who alleges the undue influence. Woodward v. James, 51 D. 649.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

That some of the devisees were slaves at the time of the making of the will, and therefore incapable of taking, where there is a contingent devise over to one of the caveatees, who is charged with undue influence in procuring the will, is a material subject of inquiry. Davis v. Calvert, 25 D. 282.

Influence acquired over a testator by kind offices, or even by persuasion, unconnected with fraud or contrivance, is not such undue influence as will invalidate a will. Trumbull v. Gibbons, 51 D. 253.

Where a will is impeached on the ground of undue influence, exercised over the weak intellect of the testator, the inquiry is not merely whether the testator was under restraint at the time of the execution of the will, but whether an influence had been acquired, and did operate in the disposition of his property by the testator. Taylor v. Wilburn, 64 D. 186.

A verdict that a will was the free and voluntary act of a testator, and not void because of undue influence alleged to have been exerted by the principal legatee, who, it was proved, wrote the will, is supported by evidence that the testator could read and write; that he manifested a deep interest in the will, and that when the subscribing witnesses came to sign the will, he, without assistance, drew it from his bed, where he had it with him. Webb v. Fleming, 76 D. 675.

An influence generated by lawful relations, such as legitimate family and social relations, is not such an influence upon a testator as will invalidate his testamentary disposition of his property, unless it is exerted over the very act of devising so as to prevent the will from being truly the act of the testator. If this influence arises from unlawful relations, and should be exercised, it would be an unlawful influence; if a will is made under such influence, it is proper to submit the question to the jury to determine whether or not it had unduly affected the mind of the testator while making his will. Dean v. Negley, 80 D. 620.

Undue influence to avoid a will is a question of fact for the jury. Monroe v. Barclay, 93 D. 620.

A will cannot be invalidated for undue influence in the absence of fraud, no matter by what influence a testator may be moved, so long as he is put under no restraint which overpowers his inclinations and judgment, and induces a disposition of his property contrary to his own wishes and desires. Ib.

A will cannot be invalidated because produced by influences springing from a lawful or unlawful marital relation, unless such influence has been unduly exerted; and to have the effect of avoiding the will, the influence must place some restraint upon and prevent the free exercise of the testator's judgment and motives in making the will. Ib.

Undue influence growing out of unlawful marital relations to avoid a will should be left with the other evidence for the jury to determine. Ib.

The line between issues of sanity and of undue influence is not easy to draw, where influence has been exerted upon a person of feeble mind, or whose faculties are impaired by age or disease. Baldwin v. Parker, 96 D. 697.

A belief in so-called spiritualistic communications or revelations is not, in itself, an insane delusion. These communications come under the general rule as to undue influence; if they influence the mind of a testator, but do not control it in making his will or any part of it, the will is not void on the ground of undue influence. Robinson v. Adams, 16 R. 473.

The fact that a draughtsman of a will was then the testator's overseer or guardian, appointed under a statute authorizing such appointment when any one was wasting his estate by reason of intemperance, debauchery, or mismanagement, and is appointed executor in such will, does not disqualify him from acting as such draughtsman, nor justify the inference that the will is the outgrowth of his undue influence over the testator. Peck v. Cary, 84 D. 220.

A will may be valid although the draughtsman is a beneficiary under it, but it will be carefully scrutinized. Oheatham v. Hatcher, 32 R. 650. S. P., Post v. Mason, 43 R. 689; Montague v. Allan, 49 R. 384; Yardley v. Cuthbertson, 56 R. 218.

A will made under the general controlling and continuing influence of fear or dominion over the testator, by one who has put him in fear, is invalid, though such influence is not immediately exercised with respect to the will; and proof of threats or violence, at the time of making the will, is unnecessary. Davis v. Calvert, 25 D. 282.

3. Importunity.^{*} — Importunity and undue influence are not inseparably connected with fraud, but may be fraudulently exerted. Ib.

Not every degree of importunity will invalidate a will; honest and moderate intercession, persuasion, or flattery, unaccompanied by fraud or deceit, and where the testator is not threatened or put in fear, will not have that effect. Ib.

Great and overruling importunity and undue influence without fraud, may, under ^{*} Influence or importunity sufficient to invalidate will, see note, 16 D. 257-263.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

particular circumstances, avoid a will. Ib.

A degree of importunity or undue influence which destroys the free agency of a testator, and renders the will not his free, unconstrained act, is sufficient to invalidate it, not only as to the person using such influence, but as to all others intended to be benefited by it. Ib.

To invalidate a will on the ground of undue influence, the influence must be an unlawful importunity, on account of the manner or motive of its exertion, and by reason of which the testator's mind was so embarrassed and restrained in its operation that he was not master of his own opinions in respect to the disposition of his estate. Potts v. House, 50 D. 329.

101. Proof of fraud or undue influence.* — Where any influence has been used to induce the execution of a will, the jury shall decide whether it was by fair and reasonable means, or by unfair and fraudulent ones; in the former case they should find in favor of the will, in the latter against it. Eelbeck v. Granberry, 2 D. 624.

Evidence is inadmissible showing that one of the devisees had, by various discourses, intimated that he had procured the will to be made, and that it was read to him, and that he had given the reason why his brothers and sisters got so small a portion. Miller v. Miller, 8 D. 651.

Where a will was contested on the ground of fraud, undue influence, and incompetency of the testator, and it appeared that he was a man of deficient understanding and education and of intemperate habits, and that the writer of the will was one of the executors and principal legatees, — held, that the testator's declarations subsequent to the making of the will, showing that he thought its provisions to be different from what they were, were admissible in evidence. Reel v. Reel, 9 D. 632.

Declarations made by a testator a short time before the execution of his will are admissible in evidence to prove fraud in its execution. Roberts v. Trawick, 52 D. 164.

Declarations of a testator, tending to show that his mind and faculties were impaired, and that a will was procured by undue influence, are admissible to impeach the validity of the will. Bates v. Bates, 1 R. 260.

Retention of a will unrevoked, where the testator had full opportunity to revoke it, furnishes a strong presumption that he intended it to stand, though it might have been unfairly obtained at first; but no such presumption arises where the testator was taken ill and died shortly after executing the will, and where, from its execution until his death, his intellect was too weak to enable him to judge of the propriety of revoking it; and of this the jury are to judge, where the will was originally procured by fraud and undue influence. Irish v. Smith, 11 D. 648.

Evidence of illicit relations between the testator and a woman to whom and her children the whole estate was given, and that she was a woman of dissolute character, and, while inducing the testator, an old and feeble man, to confide in her fidelity, was carrying on lewd intercourse with other men, is admissible, as tending to show undue influence. Davis v. Calvert, 25 D. 282.

Evidence that the mistress's children were not the testator's, in such a case, and that by reason of age and infirmity he was incapable of begetting children, where the will shows that he provided for them under the belief that they were his offspring, is admissible. Ib.

The unlawful cohabitation of a testator with the mother of an illegitimate child, a legatee in the will, is not of itself sufficient evidence to justify a jury in finding undue influence on the part of the mother. Rudy v. Ulrich, 8 R. 238.

Undue influence is not to be presumed from the fact that a testator devises all his estate to a woman with whom he was unlawfully cohabiting, to the exclusion of his kindred. Porschet v. Porschet, 56 R. 880.

Convincing evidence of undue influence, fear, or constraint in the making of a will is necessary to be shown to overthrow it. Woodward v. James, 51 D. 649.

The fact that the testator willed his property to his son, who had great influence with him, and gave nothing to his daughter, is not of itself sufficient evidence to establish undue influence. Ib.

To establish undue influence in the procurement of a will, it is sufficient to show that the will was executed afterwards under the control of such influence, and that by reason of it the testator was deprived of that free agency indispensable to the making of a valid testamentary disposition of his property. Roberts v. Trawick, 52 D. 164.

A testator's acts and declarations before and at the making of a will, showing friendly or affectionate feelings for a son or other relative excluded therefrom, are competent evidence on the question of undue influence. Gilbert v. Gilbert, 53 D. 268.

Acts of officious intermeddling with a testator, tending to harass him, and showing a purpose to hurry him into the execution of his will without deliberation, are evidence of undue influence. Ib.

The testimony of the relatives of a testator that they never heard of a will until a short time before offer for probate, though they lived near the testator, is incompetent on the question of undue influence. Ib.

The fact that a draughtsman of a will takes a legacy under it is at most only a suspicious circumstance, which may be of

* Declarations of testator to show undue influence, insanity, or imposition, see note, 3 D. 953-355.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

more or less or no weight, according to its connection with other circumstances indicative of fraud or undue influence. Coffin v. Coffin, 80 D. 235.

Undue influence in respect to a legacy is presumed when the relation of attorney and client subsists between the testator and the legatee by whom the will is drawn; but this presumption is one of fact, and not of law, and may be rebutted by any proper evidence that satisfies the jury. There is no rule of law that requires the intervention of a third person. St. Leger's Appeal, 91 D. 735.

The preference of collateral relatives over a wife in a will does not necessarily show undue influence or fraud, nor does it, in the absence of further proof, impeach the validity of the will. Coffin v. Coffin, 80 D. 235.

Secrecy in the execution of his will, contrived by testator himself, is not to be regarded as in any wise impeaching its validity. Ib.

Undue influence in execution of a will cannot be presumed. Baldwin v. Parker, 96 D. 697.

Where a person, standing in a relation of confidence to a testator who was old and in extremis, prepared a will in his own favor, and procured a kinsman of his to witness the same, and caused the relatives and friends of the testator to leave the room while the will was read and executed, — held, that the jury had a right to infer, from these facts and circumstances, fraud or undue influence, and that the onus was on the party propounding the paper to prove that it expressed the true will of the testator. Harvey v. Sullens, 2 R. 491.

The condition, character, and conduct of persons around the testator are important subjects of inquiry, in reference to his situation, family, and relations, the extent and nature of his estate, the dispositions of the will, and the devisees under it, in determining whether it was obtained by undue influence and fraud. Davis v. Calvert, 25 D. 282.

On a trial of the validity of a will, opposed on the ground of want of mental capacity and undue influence by a second wife, it is error to exclude evidence of occurrences in the testator's family within a year before the execution of the will, showing the private history of the family and the testator's relations with his wife, and the means employed by her to wean his affections from the step-children and obtain benefits for herself. Reynolds v. Adams, 32 R. 15.

102. How disproved. — Where a testator has opportunity to revoke his will, subsequent to the operation of an alleged undue influence upon him, but does not, the conclusion which might have been drawn therefrom is destroyed. Floyd v. Floyd, 49 D. 626.

Statements made by a deceased that he intended to disinherit his two daughters, are admissible, where he afterwards did so, to rebut evidence of undue influence. Roberts v. Trawick, 52 D. 164.

A subsequent ratification after a removal of undue influence destroys the effect of such undue influence as a ground for assailing the validity of a will. Taylor v. Kelly, 68 D. 150.

103. Burden of proof. — The burden of proving undue influence in the execution of a will is upon the party alleging it, where the separate and distinct issue is whether the execution of the will, made by a free agent and person of competent understanding, was procured by undue influence. Baldwin v. Parker, 96 D. 697. And he is entitled to open and conclude the case in the trial of an issue out of chancery, under Illinois revised statutes, chapter 109, section 6. Rigg v. Wilton, 54 D. 419.

As the burden of proof is upon him who alleges undue influence, where that is a separate and distinct issue, it does not shift to the party having the general burden of establishing the will, upon the mere introduction of evidence of a single circumstance of suspicion. Baldwin v. Parker, 96 D. 697.

Where it appeared that the devisee had been appointed the guardian of the testator when the latter was a child; that from the time of such appointment until his death he resided in the family of the guardian; that the latter had exclusive control and management of his estate, and his entire confidence; that just prior to arriving at age a settlement was had between them, and on the next day the ward made his will in favor of the guardian and his family, almost totally disinheriting his relatives; that at the time he was too ill to attend to business, and showed no interest in what was going on, and about a month afterwards died, — held, that the will was presumptively void, and the burden of proving its validity upon the beneficiaries under it. Garvin v. Williams, 109 D. 314.

VII. ACTIONS FOR CONSTRUCTION AND ESTABLISHMENT OF WILLS.

104. Jurisdiction. * — The construction of a will is purely a matter of common-law jurisdiction; while the question whether it ought to be approved and allowed is one of purely probate jurisdiction. Small v. Small, 16 D. 253.

Where questions of title are involved, or the decision of the case brings in question the construction of a will, it is proper to invoke the jurisdiction of the district court. Little v. Birdwell, 73 D. 242.

Courts of equity have power to correct mistakes in a will, where they clearly appear on its face, or are made to clearly appear from a legal construction of its terms. Eatherly v. Eatherly, 78 D. 499.

* Reforming and correcting wills in equity, see note, 66 D. 633-6 7.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume L.

Equity cannot, on parol proofs, relieve against a mistake in a will, by reforming the will so as to conform it to the instructions alleged to have been given by the testator to the scrivener. Avery v. Chappel, 16 D. 53.

105. The right of action. — Vagueness and obscurity of a will furnish no ground for an application to equity; for if not absolutely unintelligible, it will be valid at law as far as understood; and if it is so far devoid of meaning as not to amount to a designation of any corpus, it follows that there is no need of relief, for the devise is ineffectual. Hough v. Martin, 34 D. 403.

A complaint alleged that a testator, at the time of making his will, and thereafter until his death, owned lot 10 in a certain block; that the plaintiff at those times and ever since owned, in fee simple, lot 9 in the same block; that by said will the testator devised said lot 10 to plaintiff; but that in drawing the will, lot 10 was by mistake described as lot 9; that the will contained no other mention or description of said lot 10; and that at the time of the making of said will plaintiff was, and ever since has been, in the actual possession of said lot 10. Held, on demurrer, that there was nothing in the will, as thus described, upon which to base a construction of it as devising lot 10 to plaintiff. Sherwood v. Sherwood, 30 R. 757.

106. Evidence. — Parol evidence is not admissible to show the intention of a testator in making his will, and thereby to obtain a construction of the will, not warranted by its express terms. Avery v. Chappel, 16 D. 53.

All the subscribing witnesses to a will must, according to the rule of the English court of chancery, when a bill is filed to establish a will, be called and examined by the complainant, if they are living and competent to testify, in order to give the adverse party an opportunity to cross-examine them respecting the sanity of the testator, and the circumstances attending the execution of the will. This rule also applies to the trial of an issue of devisavit vel non out of chancery. Jauncey v. Thorne, 45 D. 424.

I. ATTENDANCE AND COMPENSATION.

1. Securing Attendance.

1. The subpoena and how served. — Where a defendant wishes to call plaintiff as a witness, under N. Y. stat. 1837, sec. 2, he must serve him with a subpoena, as he would any other witness. Rapely v. Prince, 40 D. 267.

A party to a suit being present in the court may be called as a witness without being served with a subpoena. Goodpaster v. Voris, 74 D. 313.

2. Subpoena duces tecum. — A witness cannot refuse to produce books or papers, when required to do so by lawful authority, merely because they are private. Burnham v. Morrissey, 74 D. 676.

A telegraph operator, having possession of a telegraphic dispatch, may be compelled by a party to it, who is seeking to prove a contract by it, to produce it in court, although a statute forbids the operator divulging its contents to anybody but the person to whom it is addressed. Hanna v. Miller, 39 R. 170.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

3. Compelling attendance of witnesses for the defense in criminal cases. — The constitutional provision giving an accused the right of "having compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor," simply means to say that the accused shall not be debarred the right of issuing subpoenas for his witnesses as in civil cases. State v. Hornsby, 41 D. 305.

Compulsory process to compel the attendance of witnesses can only be exercised when the witness resides or is found within the district. Ib.

4. Binding over witnesses to appear in criminal cases. — A recognizance to appear as a witness at a certain term of court imposes upon the connsee the obligation to appear, if the case is not heard at that term, at each succeeding term until the case is determined. State v. Keyes, 30 D. 450.

5. Witness' privilege from arrest. — A witness is privileged from arrest on civil process in another state than that of which he is an inhabitant, into which he goes for the sole purpose of attending court as such witness; and this, although he has not been summoned, and has not a writ of protection. May v. Shumway, 77 D. 401.

6. — and from civil process.* — Service of process upon a resident while voluntarily attending a trial as a witness is not void, but the court may set it aside, or change the venue, or grant any other appropriate relief. Massey v. Colville, 46 R. 754.

The service of a summons in a civil action upon a non-resident of the state, while attending as a witness in good faith the trial of an action in a court of this state, is irregular, and will be set aside. Person v. Grier, 23 R. 35.

A, a resident of New York, had pending in a Vermont county court, a suit in the name of another person against B, and came into Vermont for the sole purpose of testifying in said suit, and was a material witness, and as such, and as party plaintiff in interest, was in attendance at the trial. Within twenty minutes after A left the court room, B caused a summons to be served on him in a suit in B's favor against A, returnable before a Vermont justice of the peace, for substantially the same claim B had pleaded in defense to the suit against him by A. Held, that B was guilty of contempt of court, and an order was made committing him, unless he discontinued said suit brought by him. In re Healey, 38 R. 713.

2. Fees.

7. The right to fees. — A witness is entitled to pay for attendance, who attends and deposes in obedience to a subpoena which he has acknowledged by a written indorsement. Brown v. Moore, 20 D. 142.

A person attending court as a witness in good faith may maintain an action to recover his legal fees for travel and attendance, if subpoenaed, whether he be examined or not, or if not subpoenaed, where he attends and is examined. Gunnison v. Gunnison, 77 D. 764.

A witness summoned to attend court, and remaining in attendance in good faith until the cause is tried or otherwise disposed of, no notice being given him that his attendance is no longer required, is entitled to fees for such attendance from the party summoning him, and if they be not paid, may maintain an action to recover them. Ib.

Who shall pay witnesses is much in the discretion of the court, and the question cannot be reviewed in the supreme court. Brookshire v. Brookshire, 47 D. 341.

8. Payment of fees a condition precedent to attendance. — A witness in a civil case is not bound to attend court after the time for which his fees have been paid or tendered to him. Atwood v. Scott, 96 D. 728.

9. Mileage. — A witness summoned and paid fees while residing in a state, if he afterwards removes to another state, is bound to attend court in pursuance of the summons, unless before removing he gives notice of his intention to leave, and is relieved from his obligation, or is subsequently released therefrom; but if he does attend in good faith, he is entitled to his fees for such attendance, and for the additional travel from the other state. Gunnison v. Gunnison, 77 D. 764.

10. Extra compensation to experts.* — A physician is punishable as for a contempt for refusing to testify as an expert, in a criminal case, without being paid for his testimony as for a professional opinion. Ex parte Dement, 25 R. 611. Contra, Buchman v. State, 26 R. 75.

On a criminal trial it seems that a physician, who has made a post-mortem examination, may be compelled to testify concerning its results, and his opinions derived therefrom. Summers v. State, 32 R. 573.

II. COMPETENCY.

1. General Rules.

11. Children.† — A child of any age may be a witness, if capable of distinguishing between good and evil. State v. Whittier, 38 D. 272.

The preliminary examination of a child is only necessary to satisfy the judge as to the propriety of admitting the child as a witness. Ib.

Although a child under fourteen years of age will not be presumed to have sufficient understanding to testify, yet the law fixes no precise age when a witness shall be excluded. The admission or rejection of a witness under fourteen is discretionary, and a conviction will not be reversed because a witness six years of age was permitted to testify against the prisoner. State v. Richie, 26 R. 100.

A negro girl, nine years old, offered as a witness, said in answer to questions to test her competency, that "she did not know what the Bible was; had been to church but once, and that was to her mother's funeral; did not know what book it was she laid her hand on when sworn; had heard tell of God, but did not know who it was; and that if she swore to a lie she would be put in jail, but did not know she would be punished in any other way." Held, incompetent. Carter v. State, 35 R. 4.

In a criminal prosecution a child of six or seven years may be a competent witness, if the judge is satisfied of his intelligence and the jury are properly cautioned. McGuire v. People, 38 R. 265.

The fact that a female child of seven years of age was held incompetent to testify on a prosecution for attempt to have carnal intercourse with her, does not affect her competency on a new trial, when she is above eight years old. Kelly v. State, 51 R. 422.

In a criminal case the defendant objected to the oath being administered to one of the witnesses for the prosecution, a girl thirteen years old, on the ground that she was ignorant of the nature and obligation of an oath. The girl said that she understood that the oath was to tell the truth, and that she would be punished if she did not tell the truth after taking it, but that she did not know how or by whom she would be punished. The judge said he would postpone the decision of her competency, and she could be instructed, if necessary. The next day she was offered as a witness, when it appeared that after the adjournment of the court the first day she was instructed by a Christian minister, who told her that God would punish her, if after taking the oath she testified what was not true; and that she did not know this before. Held, that she was competent. Com. v. Lynes, 56 R. 709.

A boy of twelve years who habitually repeated the Lord's prayer, and had heard that the bad man caught those who lied, cursed, etc., but had never heard of a God, or the devil, or of heaven, or hell, or of the Bible, and had never heard and had no idea what became of the good or of the bad after death, is not a competent witness. State v. Belton, 58 R. 245.

A prosecutrix for rape having disqualified herself upon her voir dire with regard to her knowledge of the nature and obligation of an oath, the state was permitted to take her to a private office and instruct her thereupon. She was thereupon returned into court, and replying that she then understood the test, was held competent as a witness. Held, error. Taylor v. State, 58 R. 656.

A child of seven years of age, who does not understand the process of being sworn as a witness, nor the consequences of perjury in this life or after death, is not a competent witness. Holst v. State, 59 R. 770.

Grandchildren are not incompetent as witnesses for their grandmother, because of interest in an action by her to set aside her deed for fraud. Their interest is only contingent, and their position affects only their credibility. Higberger v. Stiffler, 83 D. 593.

12. Atheists. — No person can be a witness who does not believe in a future state of rewards and punishments, but evidence of a settled belief, not slight or casual sayings, should be produced. State v. Cooper, 5 D. 656. But a witness is competent, notwithstanding his religious belief, when he acknowledges the obligation of an oath, administered according to the form of his religion. Curtiss v. Strong, 4 D. 179.

Want of a religious belief in a witness must be established by other means than an examination of the witness himself. Com. v. Smith, 61 D. 478.

The opinions held by a person offered as a witness as to the obligation of an oath, may be proved by his previous declarations; and the witness himself cannot be admitted to explain or deny such declarations. Curtiss v. Strong, 4 D. 179.

13. Convicts — "infamous" persons. — The party who would take advantage of the exception that a witness has been convicted of crimen falsi must have a copy of the record of conviction ready to produce in court. People v. Herrick, 7 D. 361.

Evidence that a witness has been indicted for perjury, etc., he not having been convicted, is not admissible to affect his competency or credibility. Jackson v. Osborn, 20 D. 649.

A witness is incompetent who has been convicted of receiving stolen goods knowing them to have been stolen. Com. v. Rogers, 41 D. 458.

Embezzlement of county funds by a tax collector is not an infamous crime, although punished as such, and does not exclude the offender as a witness, even while undergoing sentence. Schuylkill County v. Copley, 5 R. 441.

Under the statute disqualifying as a witness any person who "shall, upon conviction, be adjudged guilty of perjury," a person is not rendered incompetent by a verdict of guilty alone; sentence must have been pronounced. Blayfus v. People, 25 R. 148.

The deposition of a witness, taken after indictment for forgery, but before trial therefor, he having been subsequently convicted thereof, is incompetent by reason of the infamy of the deponent. Webster v. Munn, 42 R. 688.

One convicted in another state of an infamous offense is thereby disqualified from testifying in Nevada. State v. Foley, 37 R. 458; National Trust Co. v. Gleason, 33 R. 632.

A law providing that a person convicted of a felony may still be a competent witness is not unconstitutional. Sutton v. Fox, 42 R. 744.

A statute prohibiting the production on habeas corpus, as a witness, of any person imprisoned under sentence for felony is constitutional, although such person may be a competent witness. Ex parte Marmaduke, 60 R. 250.

The legislature may not restore the competency of a witness rendered incompetent by reason of conviction of felony. State v. Grant, 49 R. 218.

14. — effect of pardon. — A pardon after expiation of the offense is effectual to restore competency as a witness. Hunnicut v. State, 51 R. 330.

A pardon, subject to revocation by the governor whenever he shall determine that the convict has violated any of the criminal laws of the state, does not restore his competency as a witness. Carr v. Smith, 53 R. 395.

D. having been convicted of criminal offenses, the governor of the state granted an executive act or proclamation, stating that, "I do hereby restore said D. to all rights of citizenship possessed by him before his conviction," etc. Held, that this was not a pardon such as would restore D.'s competency as a witness. People v. Bowen, 13 R. 148.

15. Accomplices. — An accomplice should not be permitted to be a witness without an order from the court for that purpose, and the application for the order should show: 1. That there is no other witness by whom the offense can be proved; 2. That the witness is not more guilty than the person on trial; 3. That the testimony can be substantially corroborated. Ray v. State, 48 D. 379.

An accomplice in the crime of larceny is a competent witness in an action of trover for the goods, and the jury may give to his testimony the same effect as that of any other witness, so far as they believe him. Sinclair v. Jackson, 74 D. 476.

A woman to whom medicines were administered to produce a miscarriage is a victim rather than an accomplice; even if deemed an accomplice, she is competent for the prosecution as a witness against the accused; and her testimony does not require corroboration where it establishes satisfactory proof of guilt. Dunn v. People, 86 D. 319.

16. Lunatics.* — The fact that a person is a lunatic does not per se exclude him as a witness, but he is competent if at the time of his examination he has that share of understanding which is necessary to enable him to retain in memory the events of which he has been a witness, and to give him a knowledge of right and wrong, and of such competency the court is judge. Coleman v. Com., 18 R. 711.

17. Deaf mutes. — A deaf and dumb person, capable of relating facts correctly by signs, may testify through the medium of an interpreter, by signs, although such person can read and write, and communicate ideas imperfectly by writing. State v. De Wolf, 20 D. 90.

18. Negroes, Indians and Chinamen.† — Persons of mixed blood, from negroes or Indians down to the third generation, are not competent witnesses against white persons, under the Alabama statute, and there must have been one white ancestor of each generation for three generations before a competency to testify can be established. Dupree v. State, 73 D. 422. S. P., Bowlin v. Com., 92 D. 468.

The congress of the United States cannot repeal or modify a law of a state on the subject of negro testimony. Bowlin v. Com., 92 D. 468.

An act of a state legislature providing that "no * * * Chinese shall be permitted to give evidence in favor of, or against, any white man," is not in conflict with the fourteenth amendment of the United States Constitution. People v. Brady, 6 R. 604.

The state legislatures have the power to regulate the competency of witnesses and the production of evidence in state courts, notwithstanding the fourteenth amendment of the constitution of the United States. Ib.

19. Persons who heard testimony on former trial. — The testimony of a deceased witness on a former trial is admissible only where the witness can state the substance of his whole testimony, and state the whole of the ideas communicated to the jury by his testimony. Emery v. Fowler, 63 D. 627.

2. Parties to the Record.

20 The common-law rule excluding them. — A party to a suit on a contract is an incompetent witness for either side, although he may be disinterested. Swanzy v. Parker, 88 D. 549.

21. Illustrations of the rule. — A plaintiff cannot examine his co-plaintiff as a witness. Glenn v. Wallace, 53 D. 657.

A contestant who is a party to the suit is incompetent as a witness to defeat the es-

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I, establishment of a will. Taylor v. Kelly, 68 D. 150.

22. Its limits and exceptions generally. — The testimony of a party to a suit, given voluntarily and against his interest, is admissible. Cowles v. Whitman, 25 D. 60.

One who has been made a party, but who has no interest in the contest, is a competent witness. Ford v. Sproule, 12 D. 439.

Parties on the record cannot be witnesses, but in chancery proceedings defendants may, if they have no interest. So at common law, an executor having no interest, or a mere trustee, may be a witness. Comstock v. Hadlyme Mc. Soc., 20 D. 100.

In a court of equity a party to a suit may be a competent witness. Glenn v. Wallace, 53 D. 657.

A party may be a witness for himself, if his adversary consent; and his deposition read without objection may operate for himself as well as his co-defendant, especially if he be insolvent and have no real interest. Fletcher v. Sanders, 32 D. 96.

A merchant is competent to prove his own entries and the delivery of the goods. Thomson v. Porter, 53 D. 653.

In an action for personal injuries, the plaintiff may testify to his pain and internal condition, perceptible to his senses. Wright v. City of Port Howard, 50 R. 350.

23. Proving contents of lost instruments. — A party to a suit is a competent witness to prove diligent search for, and loss of, a will, deed, or other paper, for the purpose of authorizing the reception of secondary evidence. Apperson v. Cottrell, 29 D. 239. But not where he has designedly destroyed it. Blade v. Noland, 27 D. 126.

24. — or lost trunk or baggage. — A husband and wife may testify as to the contents of their trunks lost while in the custody of a common carrier. McGill v. Rowand, 45 D. 654; Dibble v. Brown, 56 D. 460. But not as to the value thereof. Ill. Cent. R. R. Co. v. Copeland, 76 D. 749; Dill v. South Carolina R. R. Co., 62 D. 407; Davis v. Mich. South. etc. R. R. Co., 74 D. 151.

A plaintiff may prove the contents and value of lost baggage by his own oath, in an action against a railroad company, as a common carrier, to recover damages for the loss of his baggage. Douglass v. Montgomery etc. R. R. Co., 79 D. 76.

A passenger's testimony as to baggage lost should be received with caution, and should be discarded if there be a shade upon it. Davis v. Mich. South. etc. R. R. Co., 74 D. 151.

An interested party may testify in his own behalf when no other evidence is reasonably to be expected; and when a guest sues an innkeeper to recover the value of articles stolen from his trunk, its contents may be proved, in the absence of other proof, by the testimony of the guest, as, from the necessity of the case and nature of the subject, no proof can otherwise be expected. Pettigrew v. Barnum, 69 D. 212.

25. Defendant, when competent for co-defendant. — A party defendant is not competent as a witness for his co-defendant, where he is properly joined, and is clearly liable for costs; as in the case of a trustee for a married woman joined with her as defendant in a suit to enforce a mortgage of her separate estate executed by him conjointly with her and her deceased husband. Chambers v. Chalmers, 23 D. 572.

A plaintiff does not waive his objection to the competency of such witness by agreeing that he may be examined before a justice, with the same effect as if his deposition were taken regularly under a commission on the chancellor's order. Ib.

A sheriff is not a competent witness for his co-defendants, on a joint trial as to all of defendants, in an action to set aside a sheriff's sale on ground of fraud, where the sheriff is made a defendant and charged with being a party to such fraud. Teas v. McDonald, 65 D. 65.

A complainant may have a decree on the testimony of a co-defendant, who stands indifferently liable to both parties to the suit, and is an indispensable party himself to the bill. Montandon v. Deas, 48 D. 84.

A defendant is a competent witness for his co-defendant, under the Indiana statute, where, in an action to recover possession of a chattel alleged to have been wrongfully taken and detained, their interests are antagonistic to the extent that one of them is not liable at all events in the absence of a demand, he being a bona fide purchaser. Wood v. Cohen, 63 D. 389.

A judgment in an action on a joint contract in favor of one defendant discharges a defaulted co-defendant, if the former goes to trial on a defense common to both defendants, but not if the defense is personal to himself. The defaulted defendant is therefore not incompetent on account of interest as a witness for the plaintiff, if the co-defendant goes to trial on a defense common to both, but he is incompetent as being a party to the record. Swanzy v. Parker, 83 D. 549.

26. — in criminal cases. — A co-defendant is not entitled to an acquittal so as to be made a witness for other defendants, unless there is a total failure of evidence against him. Hartfield v. Roper, 34 D. 273.

A party charged in an indictment with a defendant with the same offense, who has not been tried and acquitted or convicted, is not a competent witness for the defendant. Moss v. Stule, 65 D. 433.

Where by statute an indicted person may testify on his own behalf on the trial of the indictment, one of two jointly indicted may testify against his co-defendant on his separate trial, although the indictment against himself is still pending, and he has pleaded not guilty. State v. Barrows, 49 R. 629.

27. Actions by or against representatives of deceased persons.—In a statute which provides that no person shall be allowed to testify in an action where the adverse party, or the party for whose immediate benefit the action is prosecuted or defended, is the representative of a deceased person, where the facts to be proved transpired before the death of such deceased person, the word "representative" not only includes the executor or administrator of a deceased person, but also any one who has succeeded to the right of such deceased, whether by purchase, or descent, or operation of law. Davis v. Davis, 85 D. 157.

A widow who is a party plaintiff, and derives her claim of title to property in controversy through the will of her deceased husband, is incompetent to testify as to matters transpiring before his death, being a "representative of a deceased person," within section 392 of the California practice act. Kisling v. Shaw, 91 D. 644.

A statute, prohibiting a party from testifying where the adverse party is an executor, applies to proceedings for the probate of a will. Welch v. Adams, 56 R. 521.

Under a statute excluding a party from testifying in his own favor, where the other "original party to the contract or cause of action" is dead, a devisee of land whose testator held under a deed from the defendant is incompetent to testify in an action of ejectment brought by him as to the non-delivery of such deed. Chapman v. Dougherty, 56 R. 469.

A creditor of a testator, whose debt has been paid out of the proceeds of a sale of the decedent's land, which sale is afterwards disaffirmed, is a competent witness to prove the amount of his debt, where he entered into no covenants for the sufficiency of the title, is not chargeable with any fraud, nor in any way liable to the purchaser, the executor, or the devisees. Hudgin v. Hudgin, 52 D. 124.

A defendant is a competent witness, under the Vermont general statutes, chapter 36, section 24, which excludes a party from testifying when the other party to the contract in issue is dead, where the issue between the parties is whether or not the plaintiff agreed to pay the defendant for certain articles of clothing which the defendant had bought for his daughter, who had died before the action was brought, prior to her marriage with the plaintiff, with the understanding that she was to pay for them; the issue being upon the plaintiff's agreement with the defendant, and not upon the deceased wife's agreement, although the latter was a material fact bearing on the plaintiff's liability and the defendant's right of recovery. Cole v. Shurtleff, 98 D. 587.

A statute prohibiting a party to an action against an executor or administrator from being a witness as to any fact occurring before the death of the deceased, does not prevent the plaintiff in such an action from testifying to the correctness of books of account which had been wholly kept by him, preparatory to their introduction in evidence, and such books cannot be proved by a third person who had no personal knowledge of their correctness. Roche v. Ware, 60 R. 539.

28. Examination of party at instance of adverse party.—A party to the record may be a witness on behalf of the opposite party, if such witness does not claim his exemption. Prewett v. Marsh, 21 D. 645.

Defendant may, if willing, be examined as a witness for plaintiff in an action of indebitatus assumpsit. Savings Fund Soc. v. Savings Bank, 78 D. 390. But a party who calls his adversary as witness, under the statute permitting this, makes him a competent witness in his own behalf. For a party by putting an incompetent witness on the stand makes him competent in the cause for either party. Seip v. Storch, 91 D. 148.

A party to the record cannot be compelled against his consent to become a witness. Tenney v. Evans, 40 D. 194.

A defendant in equity may be examined by the plaintiff, without his consent, on any point in which he is not interested, and even against his interest, if he consent, notwithstanding the objection of his co-defendants. Farr v. Sims, 24 D. 396.

A defendant cannot examine plaintiff as a witness, but must file his bill of discovery. Glenn v. Wallace, 53 D. 657.

If the examination of parties as witnesses is intended, a statement in writing of the points upon which it is proposed to examine them should be submitted, that the court may perceive whether the witness is interested or not. Id.

If one co-defendant, being a proper party to an action, cease, during the progress of the pleading and before he is offered as a witness, to be adverse to plaintiff, such defendant cannot be examined as a witness on the plaintiff's behalf, under the statutes of Indiana, where, as to the matters put in issue by the pleadings, the real controversy is between the two defendants. Though a party in his complaint name himself plaintiff and other persons defendants, it does not follow that all the defendants named will necessarily continue their adverse relations to him throughout the action. Swift v. Ellsworth, 71 D. 316.

them. — A witness is incompetent to testify if he have a clear and distinct interest in the event of the suit. Slaughter v. Cunningham, 60 D. 463.

30 Its scope and extent. — The person whose instrument is alleged to have been forged is not a competent witness to prove the forgery, unless the instrument said to have been forged is produced at the trial. Com. v Hutchinson, 2 D. 1.

A person in whom an outstanding title to the land in controversy is alleged to exist is not a competent witness for the defendant in an action of ejectment. Lodge v. Patterson, 27 D. 335.

If several have agreed in the event of recovery to share the proceeds, neither is competent as a witness. Mackinley v. McGregor, 31 D. 522.

He is interested and an incompetent witness who has covenanted with the defendant to pay certain notes set off against the plaintiff, nor will the witness's releases to plaintiff and defendant make him competent. Newton v. Booth, 37 D. 596.

A witness is incompetent if the testimony he is expected to give would create a fund for his own benefit. Brown v. O'Brien, 44 D. 254.

A witness is incompetent to prove a fact, which, if it operate at all, must operate to his own discharge in the suit, as well as that of another defendant, who is his surety. Jones v. Hays, 44 D. 78.

A witness interested in the result of a suit is incompetent, even though it is his opinion that it cannot affect him. Cochran v. Cunningham, 50 D. 186.

An interest which will render a witness incompetent to testify must be some legal, certain, immediate interest in the result of the suit itself, or in the record thereof as an instrument of evidence to support his own claims, or to protect him from an admitted liability. If the interest be remote or contingent, and not certain and immediate, the witness is competent to testify, and such remote or contingent interest will go to his credibility, but not to his competency. Poe v. Dorrah, 56 D. 196.

In detinue against a bailee of property, his bailor is not a competent witness for him without release; and evidence of a small consideration does not affect the principle. Nelson v. Iverson, 60 D. 442.

The owner of a flat-boat is not a competent witness for the owner of goods in an action against a steamboat for colliding with said flat-boat, and damaging plaintiff's goods. Steamboat Farmer v. McCraw, 62 D. 718.

A witness is not disqualified by an interest in the question at issue, but only by an interest in the action. Lincoln v. Wright, 62 D. 316.

31. Its limits and exceptions. — To render a witness incompetent on account of interest, it must be an interest, not in the question, but in the result, of the suit. Masters v. Varner, 50 D. 114. S. P., Elliot v. Porter, 30 D. 689.

A witness is not disqualified by incidental and contingent interest in the result of a suit arising from the fact that he is liable to a similar controversy with one of the parties. Riddle v. Dixon, 44 D. 207.

The interest of a witness being of doubtful nature, he is not incompetent to testify, as the objection goes to his credit, and not to his competency. Andre v. Bodman, 71 D. 628.

A person is not incompetent to be a witness in a particular case on the ground of interest, unless his rights will be affected by the determination therein; and the fact that he has an interest like that of the party offering him does not render him incompetent. Woodard v. Spiller, 25 D. 139.

A witness is not incompetent because he has a similar cause of action against the same parties, if he is not directly interested in the issue under trial, and is not a party to the action in which he is called to testify. Jennings v. Crider, 92 D. 487.

A person whose name appears upon forged paper, and who is interested in setting the instrument aside, is not permitted in England and some of the American states to give evidence to prove the forgery, but he is competent to prove all collateral matters. This rule does not extend, however, to cases where the witness has no real interest in the conviction, as where he is the cashier or other agent of the bank, the note of which has been forged. Hess v. State, 22 D. 767.

A person whose name is forged is a competent witness for the state in a prosecution for forgery. State v. Phelps, 34 D. 672.

A pilot is a competent witness for a carrier, in an action for the loss of goods jettisoned from a grounded vessel, where justification of the jettison is claimed. Bentley v. Bustard, 63 D. 561.

A pilot in charge of a boat at the time of an accident is a competent witness for the carrier in an action against him for damages to goods, unless it is affirmatively shown that the act of negligence that caused the injury to the goods rendered the pilot liable to the carrier. Johnson v. Lightsey, 73 D. 450.

A promise by a third person to indemnify an officer for neglect of duty is founded on an illegal consideration, and is, therefore, void; and such promise does not disqualify the promisor from being a witness for the promisee in an action against the latter for such neglect. Hodsdon v. Wilkins, 20 D. 347.

The competency of a witness is not affected by mere solicitude for the success of one of the parties, arising from friendship, honorary obligation, or voluntary intention to divide the burden of a failure in the suit, or from a hope of participating in the advantages of success. Elliot v. Porter, 30 D. 689.

A party is not beneficially interested in an action for fraudulent representations whereby the plaintiffs were induced to purchase certain property, although he has purchased the share of one of the plaintiffs in the property, if he has made no agreement for an interest in the judgment, and he is therefore a competent witness for the plaintiffs. Medbury v. Watson, 39 D. 726.

A witness' interest in the subject-matter, and not in the event, of a suit, goes to his credibility, not to his competency. Rowley v. Bigelow, 33 D. 607.

An exposure to a possibility of action is a contingent interest, which goes only to the credibility of a witness. Scott v. Wells, 40 D. 568.

A riparian proprietor is a competent witness in an action between other riparian proprietors on the same stream, as his interest is not in the event of the suit, but only in the questions involved. Parker v. Griswold, 42 D. 739.

A witness is not disqualified by having contributed funds for the hiring of additional counsel to prosecute an indictment for nuisance where he has no interest in the result. People v. Cunningham, 43 D. 709.

Parties and persons interested are recognized as competent witnesses in respect to the facts and circumstances necessary to lay a foundation for secondary evidence of a writing, as that a search has been made and it cannot be found. Juzan v. Toulmin, 44 D. 448.

A witness incompetent with respect to one issue in a cause, on account of his interest in such issue, is competent to testify upon other issues in which he is not interested. Bank of Utica v. Mercereau, 49 D. 189.

A witness is competent to prove a boundary of land in controversy, although he holds land under a patent which calls for land adjoining the land embraced in the patent under which demandant claims, and although, if the land is located according to demandant's pretensions, it will not include any of the land of the witness, but would cover a portion of his land if located according to the pretensions of the other party to the suit. Masters v. Varner, 50 D. 114.

Where a party collects money from a garnishee, he is not so interested as to incapacitate him from giving testimony, in a subsequent suit against the garnishee, as to the payment of the judgment. Gunn v. Howell, 73 D. 484.

If a person being tried on an indictment for giving medicine to produce a miscarriage tries to show that another was the father of the child of which the prosecutrix was enceinte, the prosecution may call the latter to prove that he had no intercourse with the woman. Dunn v. People, 86 D. 319.

82. Witness whose interest is balanced. — A witness equally interested on both sides is competent. Brown v. O'Brien, 44 D. 254. S. P., Andre v. Bodman, 71 D. 628; Cassiday v. McKenzie, 39 D. 76.

A witness is not incompetent on the ground of interest, when he is not benefited or injured by the decision, either way it turns. Bell v. W. M. & F. I. Co., 39 D. 542.

A contractor is a competent witness in an action by a workman against the owner of the property for services, to prove their value, although he was originally hired by the contractor, where the contract has been abandoned, and the owner agreed to pay the workmen if they would go on with the work. Andre v. Bodman, 71 D. 628.

An interest which excludes a witness must be a certain interest in the event of the suit, and not a remote or contingent one. Hatch v. Bartle, 84 D. 484.

83. — or who would testify against interest. — A witness interested in the event of the suit is competent when called by the party whose interest is adverse to his. Doe v. Jackson, 40 D. 107.

A witness called to testify against his interest is legally competent, notwithstanding his physical and moral infirmities, where his testimony has been referred to the jury with all proper cautions and instructions. Hagerstown Bank v. Adams Exp. Co., 84 D. 499.

In an action of trespass against a sheriff for selling one person's goods on an execution against another, the latter is a competent witness to prove that the goods belonged to the former. In such action, the sheriff may show, in mitigation of damages, that the goods were bought in for the owner at an undervalue; for the measure of damages in such a case is the amount that it cost the plaintiff to redeem, with interest thereon. Forsyth v. Palmer, 53 D. 519.

84. Witness liable for costs. — A surety on a cost bond may be a witness for a party to the suit, upon the filing of a new and sufficient bond. Hoys v. Tuttle, 46 D. 309.

A proponent of a will, whether executor or not, is an incompetent witness to support it, being liable for costs. Gilbert v. Gilbert, 58 D. 268.

A complainant in a chancery suit is not a competent witness in favor of other complainants to whom he has assigned his interest, he being liable for costs in the event that the suit does not succeed, and therefore interested in the result. Walker v. McKnight, 61 D. 190.

85. Abrogation of the rule as to parties and persons interested in civil actions, by statute. — Parties to actions may now testify in civil suits like other witnesses. Cowles v. Bacon, 56 D. 371; McDaniels v. Robinson, 62 D. 574.

The provision of California practice act, section 422, allowing a party to an action to be examined as a witness on own behalf, construed. Wilkins v. Stidger, 83 D. 64.

The defendant is a competent witness in his own behalf, under section 310, Ohio code, in a proceeding by a railroad company to appropriate his land to the use of the company. Atlantic etc. R. R. Co. v. Campbell, 64 D. 607.

A party to a suit cannot be sworn and examined as a witness in his own behalf under the Wisconsin laws, without notice of his intended examination having been given. Milwaukee G. L. Co. v. Gamcock, 99 D. 138.

In a suit between the state and the individual, the defendant is a competent witness, under section 2704 of the Alabama code. Patton v. Gilmer, 94 D. 665.

86. Objections to competency, when and how to be made. — Where the interest of a witness can be released, if the party suffers him to be examined without objection, and waits until after the rule to close the proofs has been entered, it will be then too late to make the objection. Town v. Needham, 24 D. 246.

The allegations of an answer are never sufficient to exclude witnesses offered by the plaintiff, as being disqualified through interest. Henderson v. Western M. F. I. Co., 43 D. 176.

The objection to the competency of a witness on account of his interest must be taken at the time of his testifying, if the fact of interest was known, or if, by evidence afterwards offered in the case, the interest of the witness should be apparent, the court should be asked to rule the evidence out; otherwise, the objection would not be available on appeal. Inglebright v. Hammond, 53 D. 430.

A party objecting to the competency of a witness must prove the existence of the interest which he claims to render the witness incompetent. Hamilton v. Summers, 54 D. 509.

An objection to the competency of a witness on grounds of public policy or interest is waived, where the deposition of such witness is taken, on notice to the attorney of the adverse party, who, with knowledge of the incompetency, attended the examination, and cross-examined the witness without objection. Brice v. Lide, 68 D. 148.

The testimony of a witness should be excepted to, as a general rule, as soon as a party is made aware of the witness's incompetency; and where the counsel at the trial has in his possession the proof of his interest, he ought not to allow the case to proceed without disclosing the objection. This rule does not prevail in its strictness where the examination commenced under a reservation of the right to object. Andre v. Bodman, 71 D. 628.

87. Hearing and deciding objections. — The testimony of a witness, whose competency is a question reserved, cannot be considered in determining the competency. Mott v. Hicks, 18 D. 550.

The objection to defendant's testimony will not be sustained where the complainants have made him a witness by seeking a discovery. Jones v. Perry, 30 D. 430.

Evidence that an attorney was employed by the plaintiff of record, and not by a witness, may be given after verdict. Stevenson v. Mudgett, 34 D. 155.

The competency as witnesses of persons not parties to the record is presumed until the contrary appears, and the onus is upon the objector to show the incompetency. It is not enough that a mere probability of incompetency should be raised; the facts upon which it depends must be fairly established. Johnson v. Lightsey, 73 D. 450.

A party who has given to the jury the whole of evidence taken under commission cannot afterwards object, on the ground of interest, to the competency of one of the witnesses whose testimony was so taken. Walters v. Monroe, 77 D. 328.

The relation of a witness to a party in a cause, whether of peculiar friendship or hostility, is a fact material to the issue, and may be shown either by the testimony of the witness himself, or by other evidence. Jacobs v. Shorey, 97 D. 586.

A refusal to strike out the evidence of an interested witness is not error if the testimony was received without objection. Correction should be made through a request to charge the jury to disregard the evidence. Simons v. Vulcan Oil etc. Co., 100 D. 628.

88. Examination on the voir dire. — A witness's declaration out of court is incompetent to prove his interest; but to exclude him his interest should be established by his oath on his voir dire, or by other competent evidence. Jones v. Tevis, 14 D. 98.

A witness is competent who swears that he has no interest in the result of the suit. Hempstead v. Johnston, 65 D. 458.

A witness having charged himself as interested, on his voir dire, may in the same way discharge or balance his interest, and restore his competency. Tarleton v. Johnson, 60 D. 515.

For the purpose of determining the competency of a witness, he may be examined upon the voir dire as to documents not produced on the trial. Miller v. Mariner's Church, 20 D. 341.

A witness who appears to be interested in a suit cannot be made competent by his own testimony. Stevenson v. Mudgett, 34 D. 155.

A witness's belief that he is interested, if he is not in fact, does not affect his competency. Cassiday v. McKenzie, 89 D. 76.

A statute providing that where a party will make oath that he has no other evidence than his own oath to establish a material fact, he may testify himself touching such fact, contemplates that the party proposing to testify in his own case shall, in his preliminary examination touching his right to do so, state the fact or facts to which he proposes to testify. Crozier v. Kirker, 51 D. 724.

39. Transfer or release of interest. — Though a release operates only on present rights, yet where a surety, being sued alone, releases his principal from liability over, for the purpose of making him a witness, it is possible that the release may operate, because as the surety's right to indemnity arises when the contract is made, it may be regarded as a present right to take effect in future. Bank of Limestone v. Penick, 15 D. 136.

Whether such release be an absolute discharge or not, if it be accompanied by a covenant not to resort to the principal, the surety will be estopped from demanding remuneration from the principal in case the action goes against him, and the principal is, therefore, a competent witness. Id.

A town may render its treasurer a competent witness in an action against a tax collector and his sureties, where the question is, whether the collector has paid to the treasurer certain moneys collected, by releasing such treasurer by vote from personal liability. Ford v. Clough, 23 D. 513.

A reconsideration of a vote releasing the treasurer of a town from liability, to render him competent as a witness against a tax collector and his sureties for not paying over money collected, cannot affect the vested rights of the treasurer under such vote, and is wholly unavailing. Id.

Persons who have released their interest, or removed from the neighborhood, are competent witnesses to prove an agreement by parol by an owner of land, to give land enough for a school, if the neighbors will build a school-house, where the house has been built accordingly. Martin v. McCord, 30 D. 342.

Where a person offered as a witness had given a bond of indemnity to the party calling him, which the latter delivered up before the trial, in order to qualify such person to testify, he will be a competent witness. Beecher v. Buckingham, 44 D. 580.

A witness's liability to an estate having been released by one of several joint administrators, he is no longer disqualified on the ground of interest. Shaw v. Berry, 58 D. 702.

A witness liable to defendant on a covenant is competent to testify for him after being released by him. Wilson v. Wilson, 61 D. 227.

The fact that a witness transferred his interest for the purpose of becoming a witness does not disqualify him, however it may affect his credit. Nat. Fire Ins. Co. v. Crane, 77 D. 289.

One of the two joint obligors not summoned is not a competent witness for the other who is summoned, to prove, under notice of set-off, a debt due from the plaintiff to the witness, though the witness is released by the defendant. Henderson v. Lewis, 11 D. 733.

A defendant cannot, by giving a release of his interest to his co-defendants, pendente lite, become a competent witness for them, when the plaintiff must get a decree against him if he gets any at all; his liability for costs would be a sufficient objection to his competency. Falls v. Carpenter, 28 D. 592.

The release of a witness who appears to be the real plaintiff, of all interest in the suit, which he delivers to the attorney of the plaintiff of record, is a delivery to himself, and consequently unavailing. Stevenson v. Mudgett, 34 D. 155.

The delivery of a release by a witness to an attorney in a cause, is a delivery to the party who employed him. Id.

A colorable assignment of a chose in action, for the purpose of allowing a legal plaintiff to testify, does not divest his interest. Phinney v. Tracey, 44 D. 116.

The release executed at the trial of one of the necessary parties plaintiff does not make him a competent witness for his co-plaintiff. Scott v. Brown, 67 D. 256.

A release, to qualify a witness, must be given before the testimony is closed, or it comes too late. But if the trial is not over, the court will permit the witness to be re-examined after he is released, and it will generally be sufficient to ask him if his testimony already given is true, the circumstances under which it has been given going only to the credibility. Nat. Fire I. Co. v. Crane, 77 D. 289.

The release to a witness to render him competent where his interest or incompetency has not been disclosed by his evidence, can not be proved by himself nor by ex parte affidavits of others. Bank of Utica v. Mercereau, 49 D. 189.

B. Various Applications of the Common-law Rule.

40. Assignor and Assignee. — The assignor of a chose in action, although the plaintiff on the record, may testify when it appears that the assignment was made in the usual course of business, and without any intention, either express or understood, of supporting the claim by the oath of the assignor. Phinney v. Tracey, 44 D. 116.

In an action by a landlord against his lessees on their covenants, an assignee of the lease who has performed all he was bound to by the contract of assignment, and does not appear to be responsible to either of the parties, is competent to be a witness. Fisher v. Milliken, 49 D. 497.

The assignee of third persons who is admitted to appear and defend an action on the supposition that the interests of his assignors might in some way be affected by the action, and who afterwards withdraws his appearance by the leave of the court, is not a party to the action nor privy to the judgment, and is not incompetent as a witness in the action. Swamscot Machine Co. v. Walker, 55 D. 172.

In a suit by an assignee of unassignable legal choses, the assignor is not a competent witness for him. Hopkins v. Hopkins, 53 D. 663.

The assignor of a certificate of deposit not negotiable is not a competent witness to support it in an action by the transferee. Savings Fund Society v. Savings Bank, 78 D. 390.

41. Debtor and creditor.—Money paid voluntarily, with full knowledge of the facts, cannot be recovered back; and, therefore, a person to whom such a payment has been made, is a competent witness for the party who made the payment to him. Beecher v. Buckingham, 44 D. 580.

The fact that a witness is a stockholder in a company to which plaintiff is indebted does not render him incompetent. A creditor may be a witness for his debtor. Simons v. Vulcan Oil etc. Co., 100 D. 628.

An execution defendant is not a competent witness to prove the value of the goods seized on execution in an action between two of his creditors, who both claim the goods, where the plaintiff claimed them under an attachment made subject to the defendant's claim, as he would have a direct interest to prove the value of the goods to be more than sufficient to pay defendant's debt. Edgerly v. Emerson, 55 D. 207.

42. Heirs, devisees, legatees, etc.—A devisee who releases all interest under a will is a competent witness for the trustee appointed by it. Cook v. Grant, 16 D. 564.

An heir is a competent witness in a suit by an executor, when he has transferred all his interest in the estate. Sylvester v. Downer, 49 D. 786.

The heirs of a deceased person are competent witnesses to disprove a will by which they would take a greater share than under the statute of distributions, but they would be incompetent to support it. Roberts v. Trawick, 52 D. 164.

A devise of property is presumed to have been accepted; but proof that the devisee refused or disclaimed, though informally, shows that the estate never vested in him, and prevents the devise from giving him an interest which should disqualify him from testifying in support of the will. Burritt v. Silliman, 64 D. 532.

The legatee in a will is a competent witness to sustain it in probate proceedings. He is not a party to the suit, nor is the suit prosecuted wholly or in part in his immediate and undivided behalf, within the meaning of the statute. Lawyer v. Smith, 77 D. 460.

A legatee under a prior will is a competent witness against a subsequent will in contest. Titlow v. Titlow, 93 D. 691.

A warranty of title is implied in a partition deed between tenants in common taking by descent in Pennsylvania, and one of such tenants is not a competent witness for another in ejectment thereafter brought by the latter to recover his share of the land. Patterson v. Lanning, 36 D. 154.

The heirs at law of a deceased testator are not competent witnesses in a feigned issue to try the title to certain lands between an alleged devisee and another heir, although they have conveyed their interest in the land to the party of record. Asay v. Hoover, 45 D. 713.

43. Inhabitants of town or county, party to the suit.—The inhabitants of towns are competent witnesses for the towns in which they reside, without a release. Congregational Soc. v. Perry, 25 D. 455.

The remote and contingent interest of a corporator in a mere municipal corporation is not sufficient to exclude him as a witness in behalf of the corporation. Watertown v. Cowen, 27 D. 80.

44. Judicial officers.—Where an appeal is taken from a decree of a probate judge, on the ground that he is interested in the estate, and has therefore no jurisdiction to enter such decree, he is a competent witness to prove that he is not interested. Sigourney v. Sibley, 32 D. 248.

A justice of the peace who tried a cause is a competent witness to prove the grounds upon which it was decided. Taylor v. Larkin, 49 D. 119.

Justices of the peace, who have certified to an execution and acknowledgment of a deed, shall not be permitted, as witnesses, to contradict what they have certified as magistrates. Higberger v. Stiffler, 83 D. 593.

A justice of the peace, who has certified to an execution and acknowledgment of a deed, may testify to facts which do not contradict his official certificate, although they may incidentally operate on the legal effect of the instrument acknowledged before him; such as the age and health of the grantor, the payment or non-payment of the consideration, the reading or non-reading of the instrument, or other collateral facts not conflicting with what he had certified. Id.

45. Jurors.*—A juror whose conduct

* Testimony of grand jurors to impeach indictment, see note, 16 D. 231-235.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

is impeached by a motion in arrest cannot be a witness. Dana v. Roberts, 1 D. 36.

To defeat a plea of a former adjudication, the testimony of one of the jury on the former trial, that the matter in the pending issue was not passed upon by the jury on the former trial, — held, incompetent, it appearing from the judgment record in the former action that the matter in question was in issue in that action. Underwood v. French, 25 R. 500.

A grand juror before whom an indictment was presented is competent to prove that the defendant appeared before the grand jury to prosecute the indictment. White v. Fox, 4 D. 643.

Grand jurors may be examined as witnesses to show whether the necessary number concurred in finding an indictment. Low's Case, 16 D. 271.

A witness may be impeached on the trial of an indictment by proof that he testified differently before the grand jury, and the testimony of grand jurors is admissible therefor. Com. v. Mead, 71 D. 741. S. P., Gordon v. Com., 37 R. 672.

The oath of grand jurors to the secrecy of their proceedings does not prevent them from being witnesses on the trial of a person for perjury, committed while a witness before them. State v. Broughton, 45 D. 507.

The competency of grand jurors to testify is peculiarly a matter of discretion with the court to discriminate as to it; and in an action of slander grand jurors are competent to testify to the uttering of the supposed slanderous words before them, while officiating as grand jurors. Sands v. Robison, 51 D. 132.

46. Landlord and tenant. — A lessor of an easement is a competent witness for the lessee in an action by the latter for a disturbance thereof. Bird v. Smith, 34 D. 483.

A refusal to permit a discontinuance as to a tenant in possession, where his landlord has been admitted to defend in an action of ejectment, for the purpose of making him a witness against his landlord, is not error, because a discontinuance as to the tenant is a discontinuance of the whole action. Peters v. Allison, 36 D. 574.

A land-owner is an incompetent witness for an officer, in trover by an occupant for a share of the products of a farm sold by the officer on execution against the land-owner. White v. Morton, 52 D. 75.

47. Master and crew. — A master and the mariners are competent witnesses for the insured, in an action on a policy of marine insurance. American Ins. Co. v. Insley, 47 D. 509.

48. Mortgagor and mortgagee. — A mortgagor is not a competent witness for the mortgagee, in an ejectment brought against one to whom the mortgagor has quitclaimed the land. Jackson v. McChesney, 17 D. 521.

The mortgagor is a competent witness for the mortgagee in a suit to foreclose a mortgage against an attaching creditor. Carter v. Champion, 21 D. 695.

The mortgagor is a competent witness to prove that an assignor of the mortgage had notice that the whole of the land did not belong to the mortgagor, but was, by mistake, included in the description, where the assignee sues a stranger in ejectment. Mott v. Clark, 49 D. 566.

The mortgagor who has conveyed mortgaged premises is a competent witness for his grantee, to show payment of the mortgage, in an action by the latter to procure its discharge, or leave to redeem. Beach v. Cooke, 86 D. 260.

Where a mortgagor has assigned all his interests in the mortgaged property, he is a competent witness for the assignee to show the true amount due on the mortgage. Banks v. McClellan, 87 D. 594.

49. Notaries. — A notary may be permitted to testify as to his usual course of proceeding and customary habits of business. Union Bank v. Stone, 79 D. 631.

A notary who certifies to an acknowledgment is a competent witness to establish the due execution of a conveyance, as against the denial of the person by whom his certificate states it to have been acknowledged. Jansen v. McCahill, 83 D. 84.

50. Officers, generally. — A treasurer of a town is a competent witness in an action by the town against a tax collector to recover the amount of taxes collected by him, to prove that the witness in his office of treasurer gave the defendant a receipt for more than the sum which he had actually paid in or accounted for as collector. Town of Grafton v. Follansbee, 41 D. 736.

The testimony of a public officer is admissible in a suit in which he is not a party, to show that he acted in that capacity. State v. McNally, 56 D. 650.

One of the commissioners who sell land for partition, by order of the probate court, is a competent witness, under the Alabama statute, for the owner of such land, in an action brought by him to recover of a purchaser who has failed to comply with his contract, the excess in amount bid by him at the first sale over the amount realized at a resale of the same land. Hutton v. Williams, 76 D. 297.

51. Officers and stockholders in corporations. — A stockholder is not competent to be a witness for the corporation. Lynch v. Postlethwaite, 12 D. 495. S. P., Watson v. Lisbon Bridge, 31 D. 49. But he may be called and examined by the opposite party in a suit against the corporation. Hart v. New Orleans, etc. R. R. Co., 36 D. 689.

A stockholder who is called and examined

as a witness on behalf of the plaintiff in a suit against the corporation, may be cross-examined, and testify in favor as well as against his interests upon the matters in reference to which he is called. Ib.

The president of a corporation owning stock therein is incompetent, on the ground of interest, to testify concerning his acts as agent of the corporation. The exception to the general rule, so far as the members of a corporation are concerned, seems to be confined to keepers and depositaries of corporate documents. Blen v. Water and Mining Co., 81 D. 132.

The president and secretary of an insurance company, who are not stockholders therein, are competent witnesses for the company in an action against it. National L. Ins. Co. v. Crane, 77 D. 289.

An agent of a corporation defendant, who is also a stockholder therein, is not a competent witness for it in an action on a contract made by him as its agent; for he has a direct interest in the result of such action, independently of his acts as agent. Pa. etc. Nat. Co. v. Dandridge, 29 D. 543.

A clerk of the bank who is supposed to have made a mistake, through which a depositor was enabled to overdraw, is not, on that account, incompetent to be a witness for the bank in an action against the depositor. Union Bank v. Knapp, 15 D. 182.

A cashier is a competent witness for a bank, to show that a promissory note, payable "— months after date" was intended to be payable at twelve months. Union Bank v. Meeker, 50 D. 559.

A member of a corporation is not an incompetent witness for it simply because he is its surety for the payment of a debt which is not in controversy in the suit on trial. Miller v. Mariner's Church, 20 D. 341.

52. Parties to negotiable paper, generally. — The payee of a note is a competent witness, in an action by an indorsee against one whose name is written on the back of the note, charging him as maker. Good v. Martin, 91 D. 706.

53. — indorsers.* — The indorser of a promissory note is not a competent witness in a suit against the maker, to prove that though drawn as an ordinary note of business and so discounted by the holder, it was in fact executed for the indorser's accommodation, especially if the maker received a bond of indemnity from the indorser at the time the note was drawn. Bank of Montgomery v. Walker, 11 D. 709.

The indorser of a negotiable instrument is not a competent witness to impeach its consideration. Dewey v. Warriner, 22 R. 91.

A special indorser, or one indorsing as agent, is a competent witness on behalf of his indorsee against the maker, or against one who has guaranteed the payment of the note to the indorsee on behalf of the maker. Mott v. Hicks, 13 D. 550.

One who indorses a note without recourse is a competent witness for a subsequent holder in an action to enforce payment of the note. Bisbing v. Graham, 53 D. 510; Edgerly v. Shaw, 57 D. 349.

In a suit against an accommodation indorser by an innocent holder, the indorser is competent to prove a material alteration. Jones v. Matthews, 41 R. 633.

54. — makers of notes. — One whose name is forged to a note is a competent witness in an action by the transferee of the note against the transferor on the original liability. Pope v. Nance, 18 D. 60.

Where one maker signs the name of the other maker, at the latter's request, to a joint and several promissory note, the maker thus signing is a competent witness to prove the signature of the other in a suit against the latter by the holder. Morse v. Green, 38 D. 471.

The drawer of a note, in whose favor an award unappealed from was made, is not a competent witness in a suit thereon, although at the time his testimony is offered he is a certified bankrupt, and without any interest in the event of the suit. Wolf v. Pak, 44 D. 141.

The drawer of a note may be a witness if he has been released from all liability and is without interest in the suit. Bank v. Ferdyce, 49 D. 561.

The maker of a note is a competent witness, as between the assignor and assignee of a promissory note, for all purposes except to impeach its validity or to prove its payment; his interest is equally balanced between the parties. Thus, where an assignee seeks to recover against his assignor upon the ground that the maker was insolvent, and a suit against him would have been unavailing, the fact of his insolvency may be proved by the maker himself. Corgan v. Free, 89 D. 286.

The maker is a competent witness on behalf of the plaintiff in an action by the indorsee against the indorser of a promissory note, judgment having been recovered against the maker on such note. Bank of Columbia v. Magruder, 14 D. 271.

In an action upon a promissory note by a bona fide holder, the maker is a competent witness to prove that he was induced to sign it by fraudulent representations that it was another and different instrument. Abbott v. Rose, 16 R. 427.

55. Partners. — Where, on the dissolution of a firm, a debtor gives each partner a note for his share of the indebtedness, one partner is a competent witness for the other in a suit by the latter on his note. Morse v. Green, 38 D. 471.

* Indorser of negotiable instrument, whether competent to impeach its validity, see note, 22 R.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

A release, to render a partner competent as a witness, must release from liability all members of the firm. Bank of Utica v. Mercereau, 49 D. 189.

A co-partner or executor of a deceased partner is a competent witness against the firm. White v. Tudor, 76 D. 126.

A partner is not a competent witness for a co-partner in an action by the latter alone for an injury to firm property, since he is entitled to his share of the recovery, if any, though he refused to join as plaintiff and was made a defendant. Nightingale v. Scanwell, 65 D. 525.

A partner not served with process is not a competent witness on the part of the plaintiff to prove that defendant is a co-partner with the witness. Dixon v. Hood, 38 D. 461.

56. Personal representatives.—Where the guardian of the heir intermarried with the administratrix of the decedent, and thereby came into the possession of the personality of the estate, in an action on the guardian's bond, after the rendition of the final account of the administration,—held, that the administratrix and her securities were, by such rendition, released and discharged, and, therefore, competent witnesses in the action. Segare v. State, 14 D. 265.

The administrator is a competent witness in a suit between third parties to prove that a conveyance made by his intestate, and which purports to be an absolute sale, was a conveyance in trust to reimburse both contending parties for money paid by them as sureties of the intestate. Miller v. Thatcher, 60 D. 172.

57. Persons occupying one of the personal relations.—A mother is incompetent as a witness for or against her daughter, but is competent to testify in favor of her son-in-law; her credibility as affected by him is a proper subject for the consideration of the jury. Groves v. Steel, 46 D. 551.

The fact that a witness is related by consanguinity, or any other domestic or social relation, to either of the parties to the action, does not necessarily affix a legal discredit to his testimony. It may (not must) go to its credibility. Potts v. House, 50 D. 329.

A minor child of the testator, to whom goods are furnished upon a promise by the executor to pay for them, is not, on the ground of interest, an incompetent witness for the creditor. Sanford v. Howard, 68 D. 101.

58. Principal and agent—servants.—An agent or servant may be a witness for his principal. Wainwright v. Straw, 40 D. 675. Except in cases where the principal is sued on account of the negligence of the agent. McDowell v. Simpson, 27 D. 338; Struthers v. Kendall, 80 D. 610.

An agent is incompetent to testify for his principal unless the latter has released him. Otis v. Thom, 58 D. 303.

An agent may be a witness to prove his own authority. McDowell v. Simpson, 27 D. 338. As where the claim of the principal or master is founded on the act of the witness done according to his duty and his undertaking. Moses v. B. & M. R. R., 55 D. 222.

An agent commencing and carrying on a suit is a competent witness for the plaintiff, where they have ratified his acts and have agreed to become responsible for the costs. Medbury v. Watson, 39 D. 726.

An agent to sell a chattel may be a witness for the owner in an action for the price thereof, unless it be proved that he is liable for negligence or misfeasance, and without such proof the law presumes against his negligence or misfeasance. Scott v. Wells, 40 D. 568.

A servant intrusted with the management and disposition of a team is a competent witness, in an action by the owner thereof, to prove the forcible taking of one of the horses by the defendant. Moore v. Shent, 45 D. 618.

The testimony of an agent, detailing the representations made to the purchaser by him, as agent, is admissible, but not his testimony containing a statement of what induced the agent himself to share in the purchase. Hammatt v. Emerson, 46 D. 598.

An agent interested in the event of a suit, to the extent of a reasonable compensation for his services as agent, is rendered competent by an assignment of his interest to the plaintiff for a proper consideration. Bailey v. Shaw, 55 D. 241.

A common carrier is a competent witness in favor of the person employing, to show that he was employed to transport the goods, and that he left them with the defendants. Id.

A cartman is a competent witness to prove the delivery of goods to a common carrier, in an action against the carrier for the loss of the goods; and his competency is not affected by an offer of the defendants to prove to the court that the loss happened by the misconduct of the witness. Moses v. B. & M. R. R., 55 D. 222.

An agent is a competent witness for the principal in an action of replevin brought by him to recover property which the agent sold contrary to his instructions. Towle v. Leavitt, 55 D. 195.

Sub-contractors are competent witnesses to prove a purchase and delivery of lumber to be used on a building, in a proceeding by scire facias on a claim for the lumber furnished the sub-contractors for the erection of the building. Odd Fellows' Hall v. Masser, 64 D. 675.

A clerk who is to be paid by a share in the profits of a business conducted by parties against whom a material-man's lien for lumber furnished to erect a building is sought to be enforced, is a competent witness for such parties in the proceeding to enforce the lien. Hunter v. Blanchard, 68 D. 547.

An agent of the assured is not rendered incompetent as a witness in an action on a policy taken out by him on account of his principal, in which he is named as agent, by the fact that in his sworn statement of loss he describes it as "his" loss, and that the answer charges that he is the real plaintiff. Henderson v. W. M. & F. I. Co., 43 D. 176.

If an insurance agent fills up an application of an applicant for insurance to the company for which the agent is soliciting insurance, and is also a stockholder in such company, the agent becomes thereby the agent of the person seeking to be insured, for that purpose, and is a competent witness on behalf of the company to prove what happened between the agent and applicant at that time. Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Deale, 79 D. 673.

A clerk is a competent witness to prove the non-delivery of a package, as having no interest in the event of the suit, where the suit is brought by his employer against an express company for the loss of a package of money, the clerk having receipted for the package without receiving it, supposing that he was receipting for other articles, and the clerk's father afterwards voluntarily paid to the employer the amount of the loss. American Express Co. v. Haggard, 87 D. 257.

59. Principal and surety. — The principal is a competent witness for the surety to prove an agreement by which the liability of the latter is discharged. Steele v. Boyd, 29 D. 218.

A principal is incompetent as a witness, on the ground of interest, in an action on a bond brought against his surety alone, although the principal has been discharged in bankruptcy. Pogue v. Joyner, 42 D. 693.

A surety on a forfeited forthcoming bond is a competent witness in an action against the sheriff for neglect to make the money on an execution. Poe v. Dorrah, 56 D. 196.

The testimony of a competent witness in one of several actions tried together must be admitted, though such witness is not competent in the other action by reason of being surety in a replevin bond for one of the parties, and the court cannot require the party to procure other sureties, so as to render the witness competent in all the actions, but the jury should be directed to confine such testimony to the case in which the witness is competent. Kimball v. Thompson, 50 D. 799.

In an action to recover back money paid as usury on a note signed by the plaintiff and by several others as sureties, one of such sureties is a competent witness for the plaintiff, notwithstanding he may have agreed to indemnify another surety against the note. Nichols v. Bellows, 54 D. 85.

A surety on an administrator's bond is not incompetent as a witness for the administrator because of a breach of a covenant in the administrator's deed of the decedent's realty. Merrill v. Harris, 57 D. 359.

The surety of an administrator is not competent as a witness to prove an item of credit upon the final accounting. Henderson v. Simmons, 70 D. 590.

60. Sheriffs and constables. — A sheriff is a competent witness to prove that he had not given notice of the time and place of sale, as required by statute. Valentine v. Cooley, 33 D. 166.

A sheriff is a competent witness to prove a sale of property levied on. Owen v. Barksdale, 47 D. 348.

A sheriff who acquires an interest in the land he sells is an incompetent witness to prove the levy of the fi fa. McCollum v. Hubbert, 48 D. 56.

The testimony of a sheriff is competent to disclose what transpires in the jury-room. Wilson v. Berryman, 63 D. 78.

In an action of trover by a purchaser at a constable's sale for an article sold, but which the defendant refused to deliver, the constable to whom the execution was directed, and the deputy who made the levy, are competent witnesses for the plaintiff, notwithstanding the pendency of an action of trespass against them by the defendant in the execution for, levying upon and selling the goods for which the action of trover was brought. Hatch v. Bartle, 84 D. 484.

61. Trustee and cestui que trust. — A mere naked trustee named in a deed is a competent witness in a suit to set aside such deed. Harvey v. Alexander, 10 D. 519.

62. Vendor and purchaser of lands. — A grantor who has made no covenants, and has no interest in a suit relating to the land, is a competent witness. Herbert v. Herbert, 12 D. 192.

One conveying land with a special warranty under a decree, having previously given a bond to convey the same, is a competent witness between the purchaser under the decree and the heirs of the original vendee. Porter v. Robinson, 13 D. 153.

A grantor with a warranty is a competent witness for the grantee in an action brought by him to recover the land, though it would be otherwise if the action were against the grantee. Jackson v. Rice, 20 D. 683.

That a witness's testimony may impair a title which he has conveyed by deed is not a valid objection. Haddock v. Wilmarth, 20 D. 570.

A grantee who loses his title by a failure to register his deed cannot hold his grantor liable on the warranty therein, and therefore such grantor is not disqualified, by reason of interest, from testifying in a suit against such grantee. Adams v. Cuddy, 25 D. 330.

The testimony of a person in possession of land claiming for himself and others is competent to show that he and the others were the owners of the land. Mussey v. Holt, 55 D. 234.

A grantor is a competent witness to prove fraud in a deed to his deceased grantee, under the Ohio code, in a suit by his judgment creditor against him and the heirs of his grantee. Bomberger v. Turner, 82 D. 433.

A covenantor in a warranty which does not run with the land is a competent witness without a release in favor of the grantee of the covenantor's grantee against an adverse claimant; and if the covenant does run with the land, or if the plaintiff has an equitable right to enforce it, a proper release will render the covenantor a competent witness in behalf of the plaintiff. Ayres v. Duprey, 86 D. 657.

In ejectment, one who has delivered possession to the defendant under his parol agreement to purchase, cannot be a witness for the defendant. Jackson v. Stackhouse, 13 D. 514.

Where land is attached, and afterwards conveyed to another by deed of warranty, the grantee in such a deed is not a competent witness against the attaching creditors in the suit in which the attachment issued. Beach v. Packard, 33 D. 185. S. P., Kendall v. Field, 30 D. 728.

A warrantor of title to lands, having a direct interest in a suit affecting the title which he has warranted, is not a competent witness for the warrantee, or one deriving title through him. McKelway v. Armour, 64 D. 445.

63. — of chattels. — One who parts with all his interest in the subject-matter of a conditional sale is a competent witness for the plaintiff in an action of replevin by his co-vendor against attaching creditors of the vendee. Smith v. Dennie, 17 D. 368.

A vendor of personal property, through whom both parties claim title thereto, is a competent witness for the plaintiff in an action against the sheriff for seizing and selling the property under an execution against the vendor. Graham v. McCreary, 80 D. 591.

4. Husband and Wife.

64. The common-law rule excluding them. — The mother of a child born in wedlock, though begotten before, is incompetent to prove that the child was not begotten by the man who became her husband before its birth. Dennison v. Page, 72 D. 644.

At common law neither the husband nor the wife is allowed to prove the fact of access or non-access; and as such rule is founded "upon decency, morality, and public policy," it is not changed by a statute allowing parties to testify in their own behalf. Boykin v. Boykin, 16 R. 776; Egbert v. Greenwalt, 38 R. 260; Mink v. State, 50 R. 386; Dennison v. Page, 72 D. 644.

A woman is incompetent as a witness against a man to whom she was married four years after separation from her first husband, from whom she had heard nothing for sixteen years since the second marriage. The presumption of the wife's innocence in marrying again will overcome any presumption that a man not heard from for four years before her second marriage and sixteen years afterwards, was alive and her lawful husband when she married the second time. Kelly v. Drew, 90 D. 138.

A husband is an incompetent witness for his wife in a civil suit in which she is a party. Cramer v. Reford, 90 D. 594.

65. Limits and exceptions to the rule. — A wife is a competent witness to prove that her husband destroyed the will of his father. Wilmot v. Talbot, 1 D. 374.

The wife is a competent witness wherever the husband would be. Bell v. Coiel, 27 D. 448.

When a husband and wife are by statute excluded as witnesses "for or against each other," in an action against them for slanderous words spoken by the wife, she is a competent witness in her own behalf, and he is a competent witness in his own behalf. Mousler v. Harding, 5 R. 195.

The testimony of a husband which may tend to criminate his wife, or the testimony of a wife which may tend to criminate her husband, is admissible in a collateral proceeding, provided that no use can afterward accrue therefrom in any direct proceeding against either of them. But a husband or wife objecting to give such testimony will be entitled to the protection of the court. State v. Briggs, 11 R. 270.

66. Changes effected by statutes. — A wife is a competent witness for her husband, on the trial of a civil action, under the Connecticut statute. Merriam v. Hartford etc. R. R. Co., 52 D. 344.

In an action between the husband and wife, either party is a competent witness against the other, in general, under the New York law of 1857, though inadmissible to prove the particular fact of non-intercourse. Chamberlain v. People, 80 D. 255.

A husband is a competent witness, under the Wisconsin revised statutes, in an action by the husband and wife for an injury to the wife. Barnes v. Martin, 82 D. 670.

A statute removing the disability of witnesses on the ground of interest does not render a husband and wife competent witnesses, the one for or against the other, even as to matters not confidential. Ges v. Scott, 26 R. 331.

67. Competency in criminal cases.* — The incompetency of a husband to testify against the wife is not restricted to testimony the sole object of which is to convict her of crime, but the prohibition extends to and includes whatever may have a direct tendency to criminate and degrade. State v. Jolly, 32 D. 656.

The wife of an accomplice is a competent witness in a criminal prosecution, and the weight of her testimony is for the jury. State v. Moore, 95 D. 776.

Under a statute providing that "husband and wife may be witnesses for each other in all criminal cases, but they shall not be required to testify against each other, as witnesses for the prosecution," neither is a competent voluntary witness against the other. Byrd v. State, 34 R. 440.

Under a statute permitting a husband or wife to testify, the one against the other, in a criminal prosecution for an offense committed by one against the other, the wife is not competent against the husband on a prosecution against him for incest with her daughter, his step-daughter. Compton v. State, 44 R. 703.

On an indictment of a husband for perjury, after divorce, his wife is a competent witness to prove that she has had no sexual intercourse with any other person. Chamberlain v. People, 80 D. 255.

On an indictment for bigamy, the second wife is admissible as a witness, either for or against the prisoner. State v. Patterson, 38 D. 699.

Upon an indictment for fornication and bastardy, a married woman is a competent witness to prove the criminal connection with her. Commonwealth v. Shepherd, 6 D. 449.

The husband of a woman with whom the crime of adultery is alleged to have been committed, is not a competent witness to prove the offense. State v. Welch, 45 D. 94. Nor as to matters transpiring during the existence of the marriage relation between them, although, before the trial in which he is called to testify, the parties had been divorced. State v. Jolly, 32 D. 656.

The husband of a woman is not competent as a witness against a person jointly indicted with her for adultery, as to acts committed during the subsistence of the marriage relation. Ib.

On the trial of an indictment for adultery, the husband of the particeps criminis is a competent witness to prove circumstances which do not directly, but tend to, criminate her. State v. Bridgman, 24 R. 124.

Under a statute permitting a husband and wife to testify against one another on a criminal prosecution for an offense committed by one against the other, the one may testify against the other on an indictment of the other for adultery. Roland v. State, 35 R. 743.

In a prosecution of a wife for an assault upon her husband, he is a competent witness for the state. Whipp v. State, 32 R. 359.

The wife is a competent witness against the husband, on his trial for a personal outrage committed by him upon her. State v. Boyd, 27 D. 376; State v. Davis, 5 D. 529. And she may be compelled to testify against him. Turner v. State, 45 R. 412; Bramlette v. State, 57 R. 622.

Where three parties are jointly indicted for an assault and battery, and two of them are granted a separate trial, the wife of the other is a competent witness in their favor, as her husband has no interest in the event of their trial. Moffit v. State, 36 D. 301.

68. Competency of widow. — A widow of an intestate may be sworn as a witness in an action brought by the administrator of her deceased husband, to prove any fact to which she may testify without violating the confidence existing between her and her husband while the marriage relation existed. Babcock v. Booth, 38 D. 578.

The widow is not a competent witness to facts disclosed to her by her husband in speaking of his affairs. Such disclosures are regarded as matters of trust and confidence between husband and wife. Smith v. Potter, 65 D. 198.

The divorce of a wife, or the death of a husband, does not remove her incompetency to testify concerning disclosures made to her by her husband during the continuance of the marriage relation. Babcock v. Booth, 38 D. 578.

A widow of one who, while living, was interested in a controversy, is a competent witness as to all matters in regard to any transaction affecting her deceased husband's interests, unless her testimony involves the disclosure of matters of confidence between herself and husband, or affects his character. Smith v. Potter, 65 D. 198.

The testimony of a widow, after her husband's death, is competent, so far as it consists of facts to which she deposes of her own knowledge, and which are not derived from communications made to her by him, if such testimony tends only to show that a conveyance made by him was fraudulent as to his creditors, but does not tend to diminish the liability of his estate to the creditor to whom such conveyance was made. Short v. Tinsley, 71 D. 482.

69. — of divorced wife. — A husband and wife, though divorced, cannot testify against each other as to any matters occurring during the marriage. Dickerman v. Graves, 53 D. 41; Owen v. State, 56 R. 40.

A divorced wife is a competent witness in an action for criminal conversation, brought by her husband, to prove criminal intercourse with her during the marriage. Ib. Contra, Rea v. Tucker, 99 D. 539.

5. Attorneys; Physicians.

70. Attorneys. — An attorney or counsel may testify to a collateral fact which he has ascertained, without being intrusted with it by his client; as, for instance, to the handwriting of his client, though he became acquainted with it after the suit commenced, but not by communication with the client. Johnson v. Davenport, 10 D. 198.

An attorney is a competent witness, in an action for malicious attachment, where he consulted with counsel upon the case in which the attachment issued, and may testify as to what opinion was given to the plaintiff in the attachment suit by such counsel. Alexander v. Harrison, 90 D. 431.

An attorney-at-law cannot be called upon to testify respecting the condition and appearance of a deed of trust and trust notes, at the time of his employment to bring a suit of foreclosure upon them. That the communications to the attorney were made in the form of deeds or notes does not exclude them from the protection of the statute and the general principle affecting privileged communications. Gray v. Fox, 97 D. 416.

An attorney who has opened a case and examined witnesses is a competent witness for his client. Follansbee v. Walker, 13 R. 671.

When an attorney becomes a witness for his client in a suit which he is conducting for him, it is competent to show that he has an agreement with his client, entitling him to a retainer and a certain portion of the amount to be recovered. Moats v. Rymer, 41 R. 703.

71. Physicians. — In an action of assault and battery, the attending physician of the plaintiff may testify as to the plaintiff's complaints and statement of symptoms made to him for the purpose of medical treatment and advice, and also as to his own observation of his indications of suffering. Fay v. Harlan, 35 R. 372.

On a trial for murder, by poison, a physician is not prohibited from testifying to the results of his examination of the deceased, and to the statements of the deceased during such examination, while attending him in his last illness. Pierson v. People, 35 R. 524.

A physician may not testify, to the injury of his patient or his representatives, to facts which he learned concerning the patient's ailments either by the patient's statements or by his own examination and observation. Masonic Mut. Ben. Assoc. v. Beck, 40 R. 295.

Under the statute, the testimony of an attending physician, if offered by the patient or his representative, is competent, but not otherwise. Groll v. Tower, 55 R. 358.

Where a statute prohibits a physician from testifying to information acquired by him while attending a patient unless the patient waives the privilege, the death of the patient makes the prohibition conclusive. Westover v. Aetna Life Ins. Co., 52 R. 1.

Where a physician attends a sick person in consultation with the patient's physician, he comes within the provision of the statute prohibiting physicians from disclosing information acquired in attending patients in a professional capacity and necessary to enable them to act in that capacity. Reynihan v. Demin, 57 R. 770.

The prohibition also applies in proceedings for the probate of wills. Ib.

III. CREDIBILITY.

1. General Rules.

72. Credibility as dependent upon character of witness. — The jury has the sole right to respond to the question how far the want of chastity would impair the credibility of a witness. Jones v. State, 62 D. 550.

73. — or his bias. — The testimony of witnesses who swear positively, and are otherwise unimpeached, should not be discredited merely because they are related to the party in whose behalf they testify, although this is a circumstance to be weighed in a doubtful case. Estate of Gangwere, 53 D. 554.

An instruction is erroneous which denies to the jury the right to consider the direct interest of a witness as a party to the suit, in determining the weight to which his testimony was fairly entitled, they being instructed that to disregard his testimony there must be something in his manner or conduct in giving it, or in the testimony of other witnesses, sufficient to satisfy their minds that what the witness stated was false. N. O. etc. R. R. Co. v. Albritton, 75 D. 98.

74. Rules for weighing testimony, generally.* — The jury must determine what witnesses are entitled to most influence when the testimony is conflicting; and this they may do from various considerations: the manner, expression, and intelligence, and who are likely to be best informed, from their situation and intelligence. The proposition that if the witnesses before the jury are equal in credibility the greater number must prevail, is unsound. Jones v. State, 62 D. 550.

The jury cannot lawfully, from mere caprice, disregard the testimony of an unimpeached witness, although they are the judges of the credibility of witnesses. They must exercise their judgment, and not their will, when passing upon the credibility of a witness. Robertson v. Dodge, 81 D. 267.

The evidence of attesting witnesses impeaching instruments to which their signatures have given credit, is to be received with much jealousy, but the rules of evidence excluding it have been relaxed and abandoned. Higberger v. Stiffler, 83 D. 593.

A witness need not be impeached by evidence of bad character to justify the jury in refusing to give credit to his testimony; they may take into consideration his relationship to the parties, his manner and appearance on the stand, and his evident bias in favor of one of the parties. Corgan v. Freese, 80 D. 286.

A witness may be contradicted by circumstances as well as by other witnesses. Courts and juries are not bound to refrain from exercising their judgment, and to blindly adopt the statements of the witness, for the simple reason that no other witness has denied them, and that the character of the witness is not impeached. Elwood v. Western U. Tel. Co., 6 R. 140.

75. The question one for the jury. — The credibility of witnesses and the weight of evidence are questions for the determination of the jury. Baker v. Young, 92 D. 149; White v. Fox, 4 D. 643; Flemming v. Marine Ins. Co., 33 D. 33; Taylor v. Kelly, 68 D. 150. And the court will not interfere with their decision under such circumstances. Illinois Cent. R. R. Co. v. Adams, 92 D. 85.

76. Conflicting testimony. — A seeming conflict of evidence should be strongly scrutinized, with the view to reconciliation. Witnesses will be considered to have spoken the truth where one statement is not wholly inconsistent with another. Woodcock v. Bennet, 13 D. 568.

Where two witnesses directly contradict each other, and the veracity of neither is impeached, the presumption of truth is in favor of the witness who swears affirmatively. Hepburn v. Citizens' Bank, 46 D. 564.

Where a witness is examined twice, first by one party and then by the other, and his answers are contradictory, those first in point of time are entitled to the most credit, as being nearer the transaction. Parke v. Foster, 71 D. 221.

Where the verdict depends upon the credibility of witnesses, it is the peculiar province of the jury to judge of that credibility, and to attach such weight to the testimony of each as may seem to be proper, after a due consideration of all the circumstances in the particular case. Graham v. Anderson, 92 D. 89.

It is error to charge that if witnesses are equally credible, the greater number are entitled to the greater weight. Bierbach v. Goodyear Rubber Co., 41 R. 19.

77. Positive and negative testimony. — No general rule can be made concerning the relative value of positive and negative testimony. It depends upon the opportunity of the witnesses for knowing and the attention which they have directed to the matter, etc. Denham v. Holeman, 71 D. 198.

The testimony of neighbors that an adverse claimant did not occupy land is as good as that of others that he did; for the question of notorious possession depends upon facts capable of being equally well known to each set of witnesses. Id.

Positive evidence preponderates over negative in weighing contradictory testimony, other things being equal; but the jury's attention, in the application of this rule, should be directed to the facts and circumstances of the case, to prevent its unjust operation. Farmers' etc. Bank v. Champlain T. Co., 56 D. 68.

It is a general rule that affirmative testimony should outweigh that which is negative; but held not to apply where the matter in dispute was whether or not a testator could measure wheat, compute interest, and attend to the ordinary affairs of life, and some of the witnesses swore he could, and others that he could not. There was no difference in the character of those statements. Potts v. House, 50 D. 329.

The testimony by a joint maker of a note that there has been no demand, evidence having been introduced of a demand upon the other maker, though evidence of the feeblest kind, is admissible. Persons v. McKibben, 61 D. 85.

The testimony of witnesses having an opportunity of knowing that a certain individual did not strike a blow is not negative proof, but is entitled to equal weight with affirmative testimony of others who state that they saw such person strike the blow. Coughlin v. People, 68 D. 541.

78. The maxim falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus. — A witness who willfully contradicts himself in a material part of his testimony, for the purpose of concealing the truth, is unworthy of belief, except so far only as he is supported by other evidence in the case; but if a contradiction occurs through inadvertence, or in reference to some matter immaterial to the issue, such a contradiction will not of itself render his evidence unworthy of credit. Crabtree v. Hagenbaugh, 79 D. 324.

The jury should not be directed to reject altogether the evidence of a witness, if he has testified willfully false as to any fact. Such an instruction is too broad. If he so testifies to a material fact, and there is no circumstance in the case tending to corroborate his evidence, the jury have the right to reject all of his evidence as unworthy of credit; but they should not reject such portions of it as may be corroborated by other unobjectionable evidence in the cause. Id.

When clearly shown that a witness has committed perjury in one material point the testimony must be wholly rejected, and cannot be relied upon for any purpose whatever, in accordance with the maxim, Falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus. Stoffer v. State, 86 D. 470.

Where a witness has sworn differently upon the same point on a former occasion, his testimony should remain in the case, to be considered by the jury in connection with the other evidence, under such prudential instructions as may be given by the court, and subject to the determination of the court having jurisdiction to grant new trials in cases of verdicts against evidence. The judge is not to pronounce the witness incompetent, and order his testimony stricken out and wholly excluded from consideration, as though he had been convicted of a crime rendering him incompetent to testify as a witness. Dunn v. People, 86 D. 319.

Self-contradiction by a witness, of evidence in a former trial goes to discredit him, but the jury may consider his evidence for what they think it is worth. Id.

79. Credibility of accused persons. — The statement of a prisoner in a criminal case is for the consideration of the jury, who may give it such credit, in whole or in part, as under all the circumstances they may deem it entitled to. Maher v. People, 81 D. 781.

The prisoner, on a criminal trial, being entitled by statute to make a statement on his own behalf, not under oath, its weight and credibility are matters for the jury, and he is not entitled to an instruction that no less credence is to be given to the statement because it is not under oath. Blackburn v. State, 46 R. 323.

80. — of accomplices.* — In a case where all the evidence against the prisoner was the uncorroborated testimony of accomplices, an instruction that such evidence is unsafe, on account of its suspicious source, and that the jury had better acquit, but that the jury had the power to convict on such testimony, and if from the whole evidence they were convinced beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant, their verdict should be guilty, is unexceptionable. Com. v. Price, 71 D. 668.

The testimony of an accomplice is of a suspicious character and calls for scrutiny on the part of the jury, and for a particular caution to the jury on the part of the judge in his charge; and the neglect to give such a caution is a clear omission of judicial duty. State v. Stebbins, 79 D. 223.

* See notes on the evidence of an accomplice, 31 R. 622-626; 34 R. 408-411.

2. Impeaching and Contradicting.

81. The right to impeach or contradict a witness.* — A witness may be impeached by showing that at the time the facts sworn to occurred he was intoxicated. But the intoxication must be proved by direct evidence, or by the acts and conduct of the witness, and not by the quantity of spirituous liquor he had previously drank. Tuttle v. Russell, 2 D. 89.

Witnesses to a prisoner's identity cannot be collaterally impeached by a witness who testifies that he had experimented in company with another individual, at a time corresponding to the time of the night when the homicide took place, and on a similar evening, and had satisfied himself that objects could not be distinctly discerned at the distance the witnesses were situated from the parties. Sealy v. State, 44 D. 641.

Evidence which goes to the merits of a case, if admitted to contradict a witness, should be admitted as principal testimony. Reed v. Vancleve, 72 D. 369.

For the purpose of impeachment, a witness will not be allowed to state in general terms that he had been intimately acquainted with the party for a number of years, and had never heard him utter a declaration proved by another witness. Larson v. Hicks, 81 D. 49.

Evidence impeaching the veracity of a party to a cause, who has been sworn as a witness, may be offered by the opposite party without first giving notice of his intention so to do. Knight v. House, 96 D. 515.

One of two indicted persons, testifying on behalf of his co-defendant, is subject to impeachment like any other witness. State v. Hardin, 26 R. 174.

A prisoner testifying on his own behalf is subject to impeachment like other witnesses. State v. Clinton, 29 R. 506.

Evidence is competent to show that the mind and memory of a witness have become impaired by disease and are in a feeble condition. Alleman v. Stepp, 35 R. 288.

An impeaching witness may himself be impeached. Phillips v. Thorn, 43 R. 85.

82. Impeachment by proof of character.† — The credit of a witness must be impeached or sustained by evidence of his general character, and not of his conduct in particular cases. Allen v. Young, 17 D. 130. S. P., Evans v. Smith, 17 D. 74; Blue v. Kibby, 15 D. 95; Douglass v. Tousey, 20 D. 616; Hart v. Reed, 35 D. 179.

The inquiry in impeaching a witness involves his whole moral character, and is not restricted merely to his general reputation for truth and veracity. Gilliam v. State, 73 D. 161; State v. Shields, 53 D. 147. Contra, Ayres v. Duprey, 86 D. 657; Phillips v. Kingfield, 36 D. 760; Crane v. Thayer, 46 D. 142. But the character of a witness cannot be impeached by proof of a single act of immorality. Long v. Morrison, 77 D. 72.

His general character for truth may be proved as a fact, and the jury are then to form their own opinion respecting the witness's credibility. Phillips v. Kingfield, 36 D. 760.

Where a prisoner testifies in his own behalf on the trial of an indictment, his character for truth may be impeached. State v. Beal, 34 R. 263. But he cannot be impeached as to his general moral character. Fletcher v. State, 19 R. 673.

In impeaching the character of a witness, an inquiry as to her general character, not limited to truth and veracity, is proper. Holland v. Barnes, 25 R. 595. But evidence of her general character for chastity is inadmissible to impeach her credibility. Gilchrist v. McKee, 28 D. 721; Commonwealth v. Murphy, 14 Mass. 387; Commonwealth v. Churchill, 45 D. 229. Contra, State v. Shields, 53 D. 147.

The character of the prosecutrix for chastity may be impeached, not only by general evidence of her reputation in this respect, but she may be asked whether she has not had previous criminal connection with the accused; and if she is examined as a witness for the prosecution, she may be inquired of, on cross-examination, whether she had not, at certain specified times and places, had sexual intercourse with other persons besides the accused. These questions go to repelling the allegation of force. Watry v. Ferber, 86 D. 789.

In supporting or attacking the character of a witness sought to be impeached, the proper mode is to ask the witnesses called on that point, whether they are acquainted with the general character of such witness for truth and veracity, and whether, from that general character, they would believe him on oath. Chess v. Chess, 21 D. 350; People v. Mather, 21 D. 122; Gilliam v. State, 73 D. 161; Knight v. House, 96 D. 515; Holbert v. State, 35 R. 738.

The form of the interrogatory in impeaching a witness, may be whether the person testifying knows the general character of the witness, and if so, what is his general reputation for truth, and it is not allowable to ask further, if he would believe the witness under oath. Phillips v. Kingfield, 36 D. 760.

One who testifies that he knows the general character of a witness, but nothing of his character for truth and veracity, may be asked whether, from his knowledge of such general character, he would believe the witness under oath. Johnson v. People, 38 D. 624.

The testimony, as to the character, of a witness sent into the neighborhood where a party formerly lived, to learn his character, is not admissible. Douglass v. Touzey, 20 D. 616.

A witness's neighborhood is co-extensive with his intercourse with his fellow-citizens, and may include an entire county. Chess v. Chess, 21 D. 350.

The cross-examination in such case may extend to the opportunity for knowing the witness's character, for how long and how generally unfavorable reports prevailed, and from whom they were heard. Phillips v. Kingfield, 36 D. 760. S. P., Weeks v. Hull, 50 D. 249.

A deposition that a witness's reputation for truth is "not very good" cannot be excluded because deponent stated on cross-examination that such reputation was founded on his not fulfilling his agreements. Hapgood v. Fisher, 56 D. 663.

An impeaching witness may be asked if he is acquainted with the general reputation for truth and veracity of the party sought to be impeached; and it is erroneous to refuse to permit him to answer such question, unless he first states that he has heard a majority of all his neighbors speak of his character for truth and veracity. Orabtree v. Hagenbaugh, 79 D. 324.

A witness is incompetent to testify as to the character of another witness for truth and veracity when his belief is based upon his individual opinions and feelings, and not upon his knowledge of the reputation of the witness for veracity in the community in which he lives. Ayres v. Duprey, 86 D. 657.

After a witness has proved the loss of a deed, and evidence of its contents has been given without objection, it is too late to impeach the character of the witness to the loss. Jackson v. Rowland, 22 D. 557.

The question cannot be raised for the first time on the argument or charge. Holbert v. State, 35 R. 738.

Where, in a criminal prosecution, the defendant introduces witnesses to impeach certain witnesses sworn by the state, by attacking their general character, the state may in turn introduce witnesses to attack the character of the impeaching witnesses of the defense, semble. At all events, objection to the admissibility of such evidence must be made before it is admitted, and cannot be made afterwards. State v. Moore, 95 D. 776.

83. Impeachment by proof of contradictory or inconsistent statements.*—A witness's credit may be impeached by proof that he has made representations inconsistent with his present testimony. State v. Patterson, 38 D. 699.

* See note on prior contradictory statements, 73 D. 762-771.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

A written report made by a witness may be read in evidence to show a discrepancy between his testimony and his prior statements. Lynch v. Postlethwaite, 12 D. 495. S. P., De Sobry v. De Laistre, 3 D. 535.

A party cannot introduce his own statements under color of impeaching a witness, by asking the witness whether at a certain time certain declarations were not made to him by such party, to which he made a certain reply, respecting the fact in controversy, although the interrogatory is accompanied with a declaration of a purpose to contradict the answer. Whiteford v. Burckmyer, 39 D. 640.

A witness cannot be impeached by a statement which he made before a magistrate on a previous occasion, when a hearing of habeas corpus, involving the same matter, took place, unless such statement was read to the witness and signed by him. Nelms v. State, 53 D. 94.

A witness may be discredited by evidence that he has made a different statement on a former occasion, although the precise words used on that occasion cannot be proved; nor need he be first asked whether he has ever testified differently. But the previous statement cannot be used to prove the fact to be as then stated by him. Gould v. Norfolk Lead Co., 57 D. 50.

A witness may be impeached by evidence that a different statement was made by him to others from that he made upon oath, where he acted as interpreter and attorney for the grantor and defendant, in executing a deed, and testified for the plaintiff, from whom he received a subsequent deed for part of the land, in an action involving the amount of land conveyed, in regard to his reading over the deed to the grantor, and to the grantor's admission of the quantity of land he had agreed to convey. McDaniel v. Baca, 56 D. 339.

The testimony of one partner may be contradicted by a written agreement, by which such partner sold his interest in the partnership property to his co-partner, where, in an action by the latter against a sheriff for selling the partnership property on an execution against the former alone, the former testified for the defendant that he owned the property at the time of the levy, and had never perfected the sale to his co-partner. Deal v. Bogue, 57 D. 702.

A witness may be asked, for the purpose of contradicting another witness, whether the latter has made a different statement on another occasion, when a proper foundation has been laid by a preliminary question as to the time, place, and person involved in the supposed contradiction, and the matter inquired of is relevant to the issues in the case. Galena etc. R. R. Co. v. Fay, 63 D. 323.

The exclusion of evidence offered by a defendant for the purpose of contradicting a witness who, on his cross-examination, testified that he had never expressed any hostile feelings towards the defendant, that the witness in a conversation with a third person about a note which had just been signed by him and the defendant, said that the defendant had never paid him for certain services, and that he was worth nothing himself, and that he had taken this course to get even with the defendant, is no ground of exception. Starks v. Sikes, 69 D. 270.

The testimony of a witness may be impeached by proving declarations of a party, whose witness he was, that the witness had made a statement contradictory to that made by him upon the stand. Allen v. Harrison, 73 D. 302.

On a criminal trial the accused testified in his own behalf. On a new trial he did not testify, but evidence was admitted to show that the testimony of his witnesses was inconsistent with his testimony on the first trial. Held, error. Kirby v. Com., 46 R. 747.

Where the testimony of a deceased witness is reproduced, it is not competent to show that he had confessed that his evidence was false. Craft v. Com., 50 R. 160.

The record of a will, together with the affidavit of the subscribing witnesses made at the time of probate, being offered in evidence, — held, competent to show statements made out of court by one of such witnesses, in order to contradict the statements of the affidavit as to the due execution of the will. Otterson v. Hofford, 13 R. 429.

84. Contradictory statements not admissible unless witness is first asked if he made them. — The credibility of a witness may be impeached by showing that he made prior statements inconsistent with his present testimony; but, before this can be done, he must be asked the question and given an opportunity of explaining what might otherwise seem contradictory. Franklin Bank v. Pa. etc. Co., 33 D. 687; Doe v. Reagan, 33 D. 466; State v. Marler, 36 D. 398; State v. Patterson, 38 D. 699; McIntire v. Young, 39 D. 443; Whiteford v. Burckmyer, 39 D. 640; Sealy v. State, 44 D. 641; Moore v. Bettis, 53 D. 771; Wright v. Hicks, 60 D. 687; Bobo v. Bryson, 76 D. 406; Runyan v. Price, 86 D. 459; Ayres v. Duprey, 86 D. 657; Smith v. Cooke, 100 D. 58.

The credit of a witness who has testified orally, or has given a deposition, may be impeached by showing that he has made a different statement out of court, either before or after he has given his testimony; nor is it necessary that the witness should first be asked as to such different statement, or that he be present when his credit is to be impeached. Tucker v. Welsh, 9 D. 187. S. P., Hedge v. Clapp, 58 D. 424.

The English rule first recognized in Queen's Case, 2 Brod. & B. 301, that a witness cannot be impeached by proving that he has made contradictory statements out of court, unless he has been first inquired of touching such contradictory statements, has never been adopted in Connecticut, either by legislative enactment or judicial decision. Although this rule is a safe and conservative one, calculated to protect the just rights of witnesses and to elicit the truth, and one to which it is very proper to adhere, subject to such exceptions as a sound discretion may suggest, yet a failure to apply it will not be ground for reversal of the judgment, particularly in a case where the witness was still within the reach and subject to the control of the party calling him, after the impeaching testimony had been given, and where he might have been called for the purpose of explanation. Hedge v. Olapp, 58 D. 424.

Whether a witness may be contradicted without having been first given an opportunity to explain the evidence which is relied on for that purpose, is a question which is left to the discretion of the trial courts. Sharp v. Emmet, 34 D. 554.

To impeach a witness by his prior contradictory statements, it is sufficient to direct his attention with reasonable certainty to the subject of previous declarations. It is immaterial that there is a slight difference between the date to which his attention was directed and that at which the contradictory statement is shown to have been made. Nelson v. Iverson, 60 D. 442. But it is not sufficient to merely direct his attention to dates, names, and other attendant circumstances; he must also be asked whether or not he has said or declared that which is intended to be proved. Higgins v. Carlton, 92 D. 666.

Inquiries on irrelevant topics to discredit a witness may be permitted on trial, in the discretion of the judge; but such inquiries may be excluded without infringing any legal right of the parties. Turnpike Road Co. v. Loomis, 88 D. 311.

85. Collateral matters elicited on cross-examination not foundation for impeachment.* — A witness cannot be impeached by showing the falsity of his testimony concerning facts collateral to the issue. Stevens v. Beach, 36 D. 359; Combs v. Winchester, 75 D. 203; Goodall v. State, 80 D. 396; Turnpike Road Co. v. Loomis, 88 D. 311; Fletcher v. Boston etc. R. R. Co., 79 D. 695.

The answer to a question admissible only on cross-examination, and which is merely collateral, cannot be contradicted. Combs v. Winchester, 75 D. 203.

The cross-examination of an agent of defendant as to acts and declarations which there was no proof he had authority to make relates to collateral matters, and the answers of the witness are therefore conclusive upon the plaintiff. Fletcher v. Boston etc. R. R., 79 D. 695.

The declarations of a witness as to the place of his residence are not always immaterial touching his credibility. Bersch v. State, 74 D. 263.

It is not error to refuse to allow a witness to be questioned as to whether he had not passed a counterfeit bill as a genuine one, and what he had sworn about it on a former occasion, for the purpose of impeaching him; but the court might, in its discretion, allow the question to go to the witness under proper advice. Id.

The testimony of a witness that "he had not said" that he knew a certain fact is immaterial, irrelevant, and inadmissible, although elicited for the purpose of contradicting him in case he denied it. Combs v. Winchester, 75 D. 203.

If it is proposed to contradict the answer to a question asked a witness, the question must be such as would be admissible if proposed by the party calling him. Id.

On a murder trial T. was a material witness for the accused, and on cross-examination for the purpose of impairing her credibility, she was asked whether she had not taken things which did not belong to her when she left M., her employer. The prosecution was then allowed to contradict T., in this collateral matter, by the testimony of M. Held, error. Stokes v. People, 13 R. 492.

86. Showing conviction of crime.* — To impeach a witness's credibility, it is competent to produce the record of his conviction in another state for shop-breaking, with intent to steal. Com. v. Knapp, 20 D. 491.

A statute enacted that no person should be disqualified as a witness by reason of criminal conviction, but the conviction might be shown to affect his credibility, and that any defendant in a criminal case might at his option be a competent witness. The statute also specified certain crimes, conviction of which rendered the party infamous. Held, that to impeach a defendant in a criminal case for infamy, the judgment of the former conviction must be shown, and mere evidence that he has been a convict in a state prison is inadequate. Bartholomew v. People, 44 R. 97.

87. Impeachment of prosecuting witnesses. — Evidence of an offer by the prosecutor to leave court without testifying in a criminal cause, if the prisoner would settle, is inadmissible to contradict or impeach his testimony. People v. Genung, 25 D. 594.

In an action for seduction, the general character for chastity of the person seduced is in issue, and may be impeached or supported by general evidence; but the witness cannot be asked whether she had not been previously criminal with other men, though other persons may be called to testify as to their own criminal intercourse with her, and the time and place. Shattuck v. Myers, 74 D. 236.

88. Impeaching one's own witness.* — A party calling a witness interested against him is estopped from objecting to his competency and credibility only so far as that trial is concerned. Crary v. Sprague, 27 D. 110.

The objection of incompetency as a witness is waived, where the party who might have made the objection calls the witness in support of his own case. Stockton v. Demuth, 32 D. 735.

A party cannot attack the credibility of his own witness by evidence of general reputation. Olmstead v. Winsted Bank, 85 D. 260.

A party introducing a witness does not thereby indorse his credibility although he cannot impeach him. Jarnigan v. Fleming, 5 R. 514.

A party cannot directly impeach his own witness; but this rule does not prevent him from showing that the facts testified to are incorrectly stated by the witness; and the party calling a witness is not precluded from proving the truth of any particular fact by any other competent testimony in direct contradiction to what such witness may have testified. Swamscot Machine Co. v. Walker, 55 D. 172. S. P., Franklin Bank v. Pennsylvania etc. Co., 33 D. 687; Burkhalter v. Edwards, 60 D. 744; Stockton v. Demuth, 32 D. 735; Sealy v. State, 44 D. 641; Champ v. Com., 74 D. 388; Olmstead v. Winsted Bank, 85 D. 260; Cox v. Eayres, 45 R. 583.

To enable a party to contradict his own witness, "by showing that he has made statements different from his present testimony," it is not required to prove in addition that his testimony is untrue. Champ v. Com., 74 D. 388.

The state may impeach the credibility of its own witness, by proving that on former occasions he had given a different account of the transaction from that which he swears to in court. State v. Norris, 1 D. 564.

The subscribing witness to a deed must be produced, if possible, to prove it; but the party desiring to prove the deed may impeach the witness, though called by himself. Williams v. Walker, 46 D. 53.

A party taking a deposition, but not reading it, may impeach the witness, by proof of contradictory statements, where the adverse party reads the deposition. Oudworth v. S. O. Ins. Co., 55 D. 692.

A party to a suit is not bound by, or held to admit as true, every statement made by his witnesses during the trial of a cause, because he does not deny or contradict them at the time. Wilkins v. Stidger, 83 D. 64.

On trial of an indictment for bigamy, where the second wife as a witness for the state testified that she was not married to the defendant, she may be asked by the state if she had not previously made contrary statements. This is not inconsistent with the rule that a person cannot impeach his own witness. State v. Johnson, 93 D. 241.

On an issue of fraud by an assignor, in the making of an assignment, defendant called the assignor as a witness. A portion of his testimony showed that he had provided for fictitious debts. This was followed by an explanation which, if true, showed that he did in fact owe such debts. The trial court ruled that as the explanation stood uncontradicted by any other witness, defendant was bound by what the assignor had testified to, for the reason that he could not discredit or impeach him. Held, error, that the evidence should have been submitted to the jury for them to pass upon its credibility. Becker v. Koch, 58 R. 515.

89. Competency of impeaching witness. — A witness who is ignorant of the general character of another witness cannot be permitted to testify as to his own belief of his credibility. Stanton v. Parker, 39 D. 528.

A person may testify as to the general character for truth of a witness, from his knowledge derived from common report. Kimmel v. Kimmel, 8 D. 655.

Acquaintance with a prisoner for eight or ten years qualifies one to testify as to his character. Dupres v. State, 73 D. 422.

Residence in the immediate vicinity of a person whose character is subject of investigation is not an indispensable qualification of a witness to testify as to character. Id.

The testimony of an impeaching witness will not be excluded solely because his knowledge has been acquired and is exclusively founded upon matters arising since the commencement of the action. Fisher v. Conesay, 30 R. 412.

3. Corroborating.

90. In general. — The testimony of a single witness, unsupported by corroborating circumstances, is insufficient to establish a trust in land. Miller v. Thatcher, 60 D. 172.

The defective memory of a witness may be corroborated by proof of what was his habit under similar circumstances. It is persuasive and legitimate "supporting" evidence. Eureka Ins. Co. v. Robinson, 94 D. 65.

* When a party may impeach his own witness, see note, 60 D. 749-752.

Contradicting party's own witness by showing that he made prior inconsistent statements, see note, 74 D. 398-400.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

91. Sustaining the character of the witness. — Greater latitude is allowed in supporting the character of a witness than in attacking it. Chess v. Chess, 21 D. 350.

On an indictment for adultery, evidence of previous improper familiarity between the parties is admissible to corroborate a witness who has testified to a specific act of adultery, but whose character for truth has been impeached. Com. v. Merriam, 25 D. 420.

Evidence of a witness's good character for truth, where he has not been impeached, though generally incompetent, is admissible to corroborate him where he is a stranger residing in another state; but evidence of his general good character in other respects is not admissible. Merriam v. Hartford etc. R. R. Co., 52 D. 344.

Evidence of a witness's reputation for truth and integrity is not made admissible by a cross-examination which shows that he has been tried for a crime and acquitted, as his character was untouched thereby. Harrington v. Inhabitants of Lincoln, 64 D. 95.

The fact that the testimony of a witness is contradicted does not authorize a party calling him to offer evidence that his general reputation for truth is good. Such evidence is admissible only when the opposite side has attempted to impeach his general reputation. Atwood v. Dearborn, 79 D. 755.

Where the character of a witness for truth and veracity has been impeached, a person, well acquainted with the witness in the community in which he lives, but who has never heard the character of the witness as to veracity called in question or spoken of, is, nevertheless, competent to testify in favor of the witness. Lemons v. The State, 6 R. 293.

Whenever the truthfulness of a witness is assailed either directly, or by cross-examination, or by evidence of inconsistent acts or statements, or by contrary evidence as to the matters testified to by him, his reputation for truth may be sustained by direct evidence adduced for that purpose. George v. Pileter, 26 R. 350.

To rebut evidence of a witness's conviction of crime, his present character and reputation for truth may be shown, but not his innocence of the crime. Gerts v. Fitchburg R. R. Co., 50 R. 285.

92. Proving previous consistent statements.* — Prior statements of a witness out of court are inadmissible to corroborate his testimony. Manson v. Hastings, 36 D. 345; State v. Vincent, 95 D. 753.

The testimony of one witness that he had been told of facts testified to by another as having occurred on a certain day is inadmissible, although offered for the purpose of fixing the date, since it not only does not prove the date, but its only force is to corroborate the statement of a witness in court by proving that he made the same statement out of court. Brown v. People, 97 D. 195.

When a witness is sought to be impeached by proof of former statements, inconsistent with his testimony on the trial, it is competent for the party or prosecutor who has introduced him to prove other consistent statements for the purpose of corroborating him; and as soon as the intention to introduce the discrediting testimony is announced, it becomes proper to bring forward the confirmatory evidence. State v. George, 49 D. 392; Johnson v. Patterson, 11 D. 756; Henderson v. Jones, 13 D. 676; Lohman v. People, 49 D. 340; State v. Vincent, 95 D. 753.

A witness can testify to his own former declarations, consistent with his testimony given on the trial, when an intention of impeaching him by former contradictory statements is announced. State v. George, 49 D. 392.

93. Necessity of corroborating accomplices.* — A conviction may be supported upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice. State v. Holland, 36 R. 587; Dunn v. People, 86 D. 319; Cross v. People, 95 D. 474; State v. Stebbins, 79 D. 223. Contra, Ray v. State, 48 D. 379. Although the court may, in its discretion, advise the jury not to convict unless the accomplice is corroborated. Collins v. People, 38 R. 105. But if the evidence introduced under objection for the purpose of corroboration does not tend to connect the defendant with the crime, but it is left to the jury to say whether the principal evidence is corroborated, and they are instructed that if they are satisfied of the defendant's guilt upon the whole testimony, they should convict, this is error. Commonwealth v. Holmes, 34 R. 391.

In incest the woman is an accomplice, and on the trial of a prosecution therefor her testimony is subject to the rule respecting accomplice testimony. Freeman v. State, 40 R. 787.

94. Sufficiency of such corroboration. — Testimony as to a fact which is in itself relevant and connected with the accused by the testimony of an accomplice, is admissible as direct evidence, even though it might not be admissible for the purpose of corroborating the testimony of the accomplice. State v. Stebbins, 79 D. 223.

Where the testimony of an accomplice is corroborated by other evidence, the judge is not required to advise the jury to acquit, and an instruction advising them of the suspicious character of his testimony, and that it was not safe to convict unless it was corroborated in some portion material to the issue, affords no ground of exception. Commonwealth v. Scott, 25 R. 81.

Where an accomplice is allowed to testify, he may be sufficiently corroborated by his wife. Woods v. State, 52 R. 314.

IV. RULES OF EXAMINATION.

1. Generally.

95. Controlling power of the court.

—The court does not give undue weight to the testimony of a witness by calling the attention of the jury to what has occurred before them in the examination of the witness. Thus, where a witness testifies without objection to an opinion or belief, and on cross-examination negatives the possession of certain specified grounds for such belief, whereupon the court, upon objection, erroneously refuses to permit the party producing him to draw out his real reasons for his belief, giving, however, to the cross-examiner the privilege of ascertaining from the witness those reasons, and the cross-examiner declines this permission, but in his address to the jury comments upon the testimony as weak, in that the witness could assign no reason for his belief, — in such case the court is justified in calling the attention of the jury to the fact that he had given the cross-examiner permission to call for the reasons of the witness's belief, and he had declined to do so. State v. Whit, 72 D. 533.

The court may withdraw permission to recall, as a witness of the state, a witness introduced by the state, when it appears that an unfair advantage over the state was sought to be obtained thereby. Ib.

The mode of examination of a witness allowed by the lower court will not be criticised or reviewed unless it is apparent that some gross injustice resulted therefrom. Tapley v. Tapley, 88 D. 76.

96. What witnesses may, or must be called. — The testimony of a single witness is sufficient to prove an open account in excess of five hundred dollars, if corroborated by a mortgage given by defendant to secure all the engagements and liabilities of plaintiff on his account. Allain v. Lazarus, 33 D. 583.

To prove that an attachment was made on a writ which is lost, a person who saw the officer sign his return thereon is a competent witness, and it is not necessary that the officer himself should be called, although he is within the process of the court. Nelson v. Boynton, 37 D. 148.

A party to an action is not required to give notice what witnesses he will produce or rely on at the trial, but he may bring such witnesses as he can to sustain the issue made by him. Thurmond v. Trammell, 91 D. 321.

97. Swearing the witness. — Any mode of swearing a witness which he believes binding on his conscience is good at common law, and it seems that, under the Illinois statute, if he swears by the uplifted hand, and not on the gospels, he will be presumed to have elected to do so. McKinney v. People, 43 D. 65.

98. Limiting the number of witnesses. — The number of witnesses who may be called to prove the value of property is not limited, where that is the issue in the case, either by the power of the court, or by a statute providing that the costs of four witnesses only shall be taxed against the unsuccessful party, unless the court certifies that a greater number is necessary. A party may call a larger number if he is willing to risk the liability to pay their fees. Witnesses may differ materially upon the question of such value, and it is error for the court to refuse to permit a party to call more than four witnesses to prove it; but it may, of course, exercise a sound discretion whether it will certify to the necessity of more than four witnesses, and if so, to what number. White v. Hermann, 99 D. 543.

When a party is by law a competent witness in his own suit, his right to testify cannot be defeated by limiting the number of witnesses. Fisher v. Conway, 30 R. 419.

The plaintiff having sued the defendant in slander for charging him with dishonesty, the latter, to mitigate damages, offered evidence of the plaintiff's bad reputation in that respect. The court restricted him to ten witnesses. Held, error. Ward v. Dick, 29 R. 677.

99. Sequestration of witnesses. — All witnesses may be excluded from the court-room, on motion, in capital cases, except the one under examination. Com. v. Knapp, 20 D. 491.

Expert witnesses, as well as others, may be excluded from the court-room, except when testifying, in the discretion of the court. Leache v. State, 58 R. 638.

A statute providing that during a trial the judge may exclude from the court-room any witness of the adverse party not at the time under examination, does not authorize the exclusion of a party to the cause. Schneider v. Haas, 58 R. 296.

The exclusion of witnesses from the court-room is discretionary with the court, and where the defendant, before examining his witnesses, moves to exclude the plaintiff's witnesses, who have not yet testified, but does not include his own witnesses, a denial of such motion is not improper. Sanders v. Johnson, 36 D. 564.

A witness unintentionally disobeying the order of the court excluding witnesses from the court-room should not be incapacitated from testifying, where neither the party to be benefited by his testimony nor his counsel was privy to the disobedience. Keith v. Wilson, 35 D. 443. S. P., State v. Thomas, 60 R. 720.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

The testimony of a witness who has remained in the court-room after an order directing all witnesses to withdraw from the room may be received at the discretion of the trial judge. Laughlin v. State, 51 D. 444.

On trial for receiving stolen goods, on motion of the attorney for the commonwealth, without objection by the prisoner's counsel, the court directed the witnesses to leave the court-room; and they all left but one, who was in the prisoner's box, held on a requisition for larceny of the same goods. The attorney for the commonwealth offered that man as a witness. Held, not disqualified by reason of his remaining in the court-room, after the order of the court. Hey v. Com., 34 R. 799.

100. Employment of interpreters. — The testimony of a witness may be communicated to the jury by an officer of the court, in the presence and hearing of the witness, when the witness is unable from physical weakness to speak loud enough to be heard by the jury. Conner v. State, 71 D. 184.

A witness, who was a foreigner, testified that he never made a certain statement to anyone. To impeach the witness in respect to the statement, L. was called, to whom the witness had conversed only through an interpreter. Held, that L. could not testify as to the fact of witness having made the statement, but that the interpreter who had communicated the statement to him must be produced and sworn. State v. Noyes, 4 R. 37.

2. Examination-in-chief; Cross-examination; Re-examination.

101. What questions are proper. — Upon the trial of the question whether a certain manufacturer was at a given time insolvent, and known by plaintiff so to be, the defendant, after showing that such manufacturer was engaged in the manufacture of mousselines de laine, and that plaintiff had business with him, may ask whether it was a fact known to the community that the printing of mousselines de laine was a business ruinous to those engaged therein. Denny v. Dana, 48 D. 655.

The following are proper questions to a witness in a case of homicide, to establish the general character of the deceased for violence in a particular place: "Are you acquainted with the general character of the deceased for violence in the particular place where the difficulty occurred?" and, "What was the character of the deceased for violence in that particular place?" Keener v. State, 63 D. 269.

In a criminal case, it is the duty of the presiding judge to question reluctant witnesses, if necessary to elicit the truth. Varredoe v. State, 58 R. 465.

102. What questions are improper. — A question is properly excluded when the answer to it could not have been material. Eastman v. Amoskeag Mfg. Co., 82 D. 201.

A witness cannot testify as to a matter of law, and an interrogatory necessarily involving a question of law is improper. Tomlin v. Hilyard, 92 D. 118.

A witness called by a defendant cannot, upon his examination in chief, for the purpose of sustaining the defense, give the statements and declarations of the defendant made out of the presence and hearing of the plaintiff. Knight v. House, 96 D. 515.

A witness cannot be asked a question so framed as indirectly to call upon him to testify to a private conversation between him and his wife. Bakhois v. Parker, 96 D. 697.

A witness, in the same business in another place, and where the conditions are unlike, cannot be asked the proportion between his stock and sales, to raise a presumption of fraudulent statement by the plaintiff. Jones v. Mechanics' Fire Ins. Co., 13 R. 405.

103. Leading questions.* — A leading question is not always capable of being fully answered by yes or no; for, though not answerable by either of these monosyllables, it is leading if it suggests the response which the questioner desires. People v. Mather, 21 D. 122; Snyder v. Snyder, 6 D. 493; Stringfellow v. State, 59 D. 247. Or if it assume a fact to be proved which is not proved, or if, embodying a material fact, it admits of an answer by a simple negative or affirmative. Turney v. State, 47 D. 74. But where questions merely call the attention of the witness to the subject-matter, they are not to be considered leading. Donnell v. Jones et al., 48 D. 59.

Questions asking a witness whether or not he is acquainted with signatures to certain deeds, and whether or not they are genuine, or what he knows in reference to the execution of an inclosed paper, are not leading. Wells v. Jackson Iron Mfg. Co., 90 D. 575.

An objection to an interrogatory as "leading," being to form and manner in which the question was put, should be made before the commissioner by whom the evidence is taken. Smith v. Cooke, 100 D. 58.

Whether a leading question shall be permitted rests in the sound discretion of the court in which the trial is had, and decisions with respect to them are not the subject of exception. Barton v. Kane, 84 D. 728. Yet, if an established rule of law has been violated and leading questions permitted in a case which did not justify them, the appellate court will grant a new trial. Turney v. State, 47 D. 74.

A leading question may, in the discretion of the court, be permitted on cross-examination, although it relates to matters not inquired of upon the direct examination. Moody v. Rowell, 28 D. 317.

* Leading questions, definition of and when permissible, see note, 47 D. 81-85.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume L.

The rule concerning leading questions is as stringent respecting witnesses called to impeach witnesses as it is respecting other witnesses. Allen v. State, 73 D. 760.

Where a question leading in form is asked which merely relates to the subject-matter, it should be allowed. Stringfellow v. State, 59 D. 247.

When the witness appears to be in the interest of the adverse party, the court may properly permit the direct examination to approach or assume the form of a cross-examination. People v. Mather, 21 D. 122.

Questions relating to introductory matter, and designed to bring the mind of the witness to some point material to the issue, may be put in the leading form. Ib.

Exceptions to the rule forbidding leading questions to be put to a witness on his direct examination exist when he is manifestly hostile to the interest of the party calling him, or when he has exhausted his memory without stating the particular required, where it is a proper name or other fact which cannot be arrived at by a general inquiry, or when the witness is a child of tender years, whose attention cannot be otherwise called to the subject-matter. Turney v. State, 47 D. 74.

On a trial of a prisoner for rape, who was the guardian of the person outraged, the latter, being a witness for the prosecution, and having testified that the outrage was committed about seven months before, when she was just sixteen, was asked: "Did the prisoner then, or at any subsequent time, say anything to you in relation to this matter, to dissuade you from disclosing it? State when, where, and what he said." Held, improper, because leading. Ib.

On the trial of a prisoner for rape, the person upon whom it was committed, being a witness for the prosecution, and having testified that the prisoner was her step-father, and also guardian, with whom she had lived from the time she was eight or nine till her sixteenth birthday, when the outrage was committed, during which time he was very affectionate, was asked: "If in any of his antecedent conversations the prisoner offered property, or any other advancement to you, in order to attach you to him, say so." Held, improper, because leading. Ib.

Under the above circumstances, the same witness was asked, "If, at any time subsequent to the transaction [outrage], the prisoner said anything about what punishment the laws of the state of Mississippi would inflict on him, or you, or both—state it all." Held, improper, because leading. Ib.

The words "whether or not," preceding a leading question, do not relieve it of its objectionable form or character. People v. Mather, 21 D. 122.

104. Necessity and sufficiency of objections to testimony. — Where, in order to sustain an objection to a question asked a witness, the court would have to assume a fact about which there was a conflict of evidence, the objection must be overruled. Adams v. Capron, 83 D. 566.

Where the grounds of objection to a question asked a witness are not pointed out or urged to the judge at the trial, they will not be considered by the appellate court. Rawls v. Am. M. L. Ins. Co., 84 D. 280.

Objection to the first of a series of successive questions, if improperly overruled, may be regarded as going, not merely to the first question, but to the others which sprang naturally from it, and the party will be allowed the benefit of his exception as to the whole. Barton v. Kane, 84 D. 728.

Strictly speaking, there is no case in which a witness is at liberty to object to a question. That is the office of the party or the court. The right of the witness is to decline an answer if the court sustains his claim of privilege. When the question is relevant, it cannot be excluded on the objection of the party, and the witness is free to assert or to waive his privilege; but when the question is irrelevant, the objection properly proceeds from the party, and the witness has no concern in the matter, unless it is overruled by the judge. Turnpike Road Co. v. Loomis, 88 D. 311.

A general objection to a statement of a witness as to his authority as agent, made after he has testified without objection to his acts as such agent, is properly overruled, as the court cannot know judicially that his action was not accepted and followed by his principal, and if so, it is immaterial whether he had or had not any original authority. Edwards v. Chandler, 90 D. 249.

105. Extent of the right to cross-examine. * — A party electing to call a witness who is interested adversely to him, for examination upon a particular point, admits his credibility, and the other party may examine him generally. Varick v. Jackson, 19 D. 571.

The cross-examination of a witness sworn to impeach another may be sufficiently searching and comprehensive to show the opportunities which the former had of knowing the character of the latter, and when, and from what persons, the injurious reports were heard, and whether the imputed bad reputation is real, or has been created for a special purpose. People v. Mather, 21 D. 122.

The cross-examination of witnesses cannot be made available by a party to prove an affirmative before he has opened his case. Mackinley v. McGregor, 31 D. 522.

* Defendant in criminal prosecution, cross-examination of, see note, 19 R. 343-342.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

Evidence, even on cross-examination, foreign to the issue, may be rejected. State v. Whittier, 38 D. 272.

Cross-examination as to new matter, when it is part of the res gesta, is allowable. Bank v. Fordyce, 49 D. 561.

A merchant plaintiff proving entries may be cross-examined as to the circumstances under which the entries were made. Thomson v. Porter, 53 D. 653.

A defendant has no right to cross-examine plaintiff's witness as to matters of defense which have no dependence upon or necessary connection with his direct testimony, but the defendant must make the witness his own witness as to such testimony. Mitchell v. Welch, 55 D. 557.

A party has a right to cross-examine an adverse witness, who has been examined in chief, fully as to his knowledge touching any and all facts material to the case. Fralick v. Presley, 65 D. 413.

Regularly, a cross-examination should immediately follow a direct examination, but the former may be postponed by the court; not, however, to the injury of one having the right to cross-examine. Ib.

The cross-examination of plaintiff's witness cannot be postponed by court, against defendant's wishes, until after plaintiff has made out a prima facie case, and closed, without trenching upon the right of cross-examination. Ib.

A witness may always be questioned concerning his relationship to parties, and the state of his feelings toward them, with a view that the jury may judge of the impartiality of his testimony. Berach v. State, 74 D. 263.

Where, in an action against an express company for the loss of a package of money, the company proves by its agent the custom of its drivers in regard to the delivery of parcels and taking of receipts, evidence is admissible on cross-examination that the driver who had the package had stolen packages of money, and that some time after the loss of the package the company arrested the driver and made him surrender some money and jewelry, and that he escaped from the officer and ran away. American Express Co. v. Haggard, 87 D. 257.

Witnesses may be cross-examined, not only upon the facts involved in the issue, but also upon such collateral matters as may enable the jury to appreciate their fairness and reliability. It is within the discretion of the court how far this inquiry may go, but within this discretion a witness may be asked concerning all antecedents which are really significant. Wilbur v. Flood, 93 D. 203.

On a criminal trial the state had introduced evidence impeaching the general moral character of the defendant's witness, Lee. The defendant introduced a witness, Stapp, who swore that Lee's reputation for truth and veracity was good. Held, that the state might on cross-examination of Stapp show that Lee had been reputed to have been arrested for felony. Wachstetter v. State, 50 R. 94.

106. What questions may be asked on cross-examination. — A question may be proposed to a witness for the purpose of discrediting him, either by calling others to contradict him, or by having him contradict himself, when the matter about which the question is asked is a legitimate subject of inquiry. Fries v. Brugler, 21 D. 52.

A witness to the general character of the plaintiff, in a slander suit, testifying that he had never before heard plaintiff's character attacked, may be properly questioned on behalf of defendant, as to whether or not he knew of its being impeached on certain specified occasions. Martin v. Miller, 28 D. 342.

Questions may be asked upon cross-examination to test the accuracy or veracity of a witness. Stevens v. Beach, 36 D. 359.

Where a scrivener has stated in his examination that the testator furnished him with the matter for the will, it is admissible to ask the witness on cross-examination what those instructions were, in cases where the will has been attacked on the ground of imbecility and undue influence, but solely with a view to these points. Iddings v. Iddings, 10 D. 450.

On cross-examination a witness called to impeach a will on account of the mental imbecility of the testator, may be asked whether he has not accepted a devise under it. Irish v. Smith, 11 D. 648.

A witness to a note may be asked at the trial of an action thereon, "whether the said defendant was not in a state of complete intoxication at the time the note was signed by him, and whether he was not, at that time, wholly unfit for the transaction of any kind of business in consequence of such intoxication?" Burroughs v. Richman, 23 D. 717.

A witness, offered to prove a license, may be asked whether or not it was understood by the parties that it was conditional. Mumford v. Whitney, 30 D. 60.

A witness interrogated as to the possession of property alleged to have been wrongfully taken, with a view to show a prima facie ownership, may be asked on cross-examination whether he knew who owned the property; but the refusal of the court to allow the question is not a ground for refusal, where the court offered to permit a recall of the witness by the defendant, as the adoption of this course is a matter within the sound discretion of the court. Davis v. Simma, 81 D. 462.

In an action by an unmarried woman for her own seduction, it is improper to ask her on cross-examination, for the purpose of im-peaching her character, if she had not had sexual intercourse with other men; but if a child had been born as the result of the alleged seduction, the inquiry is proper on the question of paternity, in order to mitigate damages. Smith v. Yaryan, 35 R. 232.

On an indictment for selling lottery tickets, the prisoner, on cross-examination, may be asked whether he had been in that business, and had been convicted of mailing lottery circulars. People v. Noelke, 46 R. 123.

Where a plaintiff has testified in his own behalf in a suit for personal injury by a defective sidewalk, it is discretionary to allow him to be asked, on cross-examination, whether he had not combined with others, several years before, to defraud an insurance company, he not claiming his privilege. South Bend v. Hardy, 49 R. 792.

It is proper to ask a witness in a trial for murder how he was employed during the few minutes that passed after he and the defendant came out of a house to where the deceased and others were standing, and before the fight took place in which the killing occurred, where the witness had testified as to what happened during that time on his direct examination. Stewart v. State, 53 D. 426.

The conduct of a prisoner before the killing is vitally important to the determination of the case, on a trial for murder in the second degree; it is therefore proper to ask a witness what the employment of the prisoner was from the time that he and the prisoner came out of a house to where the deceased, with others, was standing, till the time the fight began in which the killing occurred. Ib.

The intent with which deceased and others went to a prisoner's house on the night of the killing is important; and to ascertain it, it is proper to ask one of the persons who accompanied him as to the conversation that took place amongst them, while they were together, in relation to the subject-matter in dispute, and their purpose in going to the house. Ib.

On trial for murder a witness was asked, under objection, if he had ever been confined in jail. The court instructed the witness that he was not bound to answer, and he refused to answer. Held, that there was no error in allowing the question to be put. Smith v. State, 54 R. 752.

A witness may be asked, on cross-examination, if he has ever been confined in state prison. It is not necessary to produce the record of the conviction. Wilbur v. Flood, 93 D. 203.

107. What may not be. — A question which assumes, as proved, an unproved fact, is not permissible even on cross-examination. People v. Mather, 21 D. 122.

The prisoner on a trial for murder, having given testimony on his own behalf, may not be asked on cross-examination if he did not "belong to the Jesse James gang." Clark v. State, 56 R. 45.

A question which it is alike degrading to answer, or to decline to answer, should never be put, unless, in the judgment of the court, it is likely to promote the ends of justice. Turnpike Road Co. v. Loomis, 88 D. 311.

In practice, the asking of questions to degrade a witness is regulated by the discretion of the judge in each particular case. Ib.

The court before which a cause is tried is authorized, in the exercise of sound discretion, to exclude disparaging inquiries as to particular transactions irrelevant to the issue, tending to degrade the witness, or put for the avowed purpose of discrediting him; and this may be done upon the objection of the party without putting the witness to his election. Ib.

Disparaging questions, not relevant to the issue, and put for the express purpose of discrediting a witness, or otherwise degrading him, should be allowed, in the court's exercise of a wise discretion, when they will promote the ends of justice, but excluded when they seem unjust to the witness and uncalled for by the circumstances of the case. Ib.

Courts have the power to protect witnesses from irrelevant assault and inquisition. Ib.

On the trial of a criminal information, the prisoner having testified on his own behalf, cannot, on cross-examination, be required to disclose communications between himself and counsel, in respect to which he did not testify on his direct examination. State v. White, 27 R. 137.

On a trial for burglary it is incompetent to ask the prisoner on cross-examination if he had not been arrested for bigamy, as such evidence does not legitimately tend to impair his credibility. People v. Crapo, 32 R. 302.

108. Sufficiency and effect of witness's answer. — In the cross-examination of a witness, a party has a right to stop him if his answer relates to matters which the party who calls the witness has no right to introduce in evidence; and the latter cannot insist on his fully answering. Gruder v. Bowles, 2 D. 665.

Testimony is not incompetent as containing a conclusion of the law, when a witness swears that he never heard any other person than plaintiff claim the property while plaintiff had possession and exercised ownership; and such testimony is introduced merely to negative the existence of an adverse claim while plaintiff was in possession. Maxwell v. Harrison, 52 D. 385.

The testimony of a witness is sufficiently definite to be submitted to the jury, where, after testifying cautiously and hesitatingly as to sending notices of protest, he said on cross-examination that while he had no doubt that he did mail the notices, he could not say that he distinctly remembered the precise fact. Fulton v. Maccracken, 81 D. 620.

Where a witness answers that he cannot tell, but "presumes" the existence or non-existence of facts, his testimony is not admissible as evidence. Hovey v. Chase, 83 D. 514.

A positive answer of a witness to a question in chief does not preclude the adverse party, upon cross-examination, from requiring the witness to reaffirm or deny his previous statement, and to give a detail of the circumstances surrounding the fact to which he has testified, and tending to disprove its existence. Phillips v. Ehoell, 84 D. 373.

Where a witness testifies to an admission made by a party to the suit, but says, "he only heard a part of the conversation," the court will not, in the absence of proof, infer that there was further conversation relating to the subject-matter of the suit, but will allow the statement of the witness to go to the jury. Williams v. Keyser, 89 D. 244.

What a witness hears of a conversation in relation to the subject-matter of the suit is the whole of the conversation, so far as his testimony is concerned; and if there was conversation with other persons at the same time, in relation to the same matter, and explanatory of that heard and that not heard, it is incumbent on the party objecting to show what it was. Id.

A party asking a witness a question cannot object to his answer if it be responsive to the question. Higgins v. Carlton, 92 D. 666.

Where the party sought to be charged with notice, testifies first that he never received the notice, and on cross-examination that he did not remember receiving it, and thought that if he had seen it he should have remembered it, — held, that the question of notice was properly submitted to the jury. Austin v. Holland, 25 R. 246.

Where a witness, called on to testify to the previous testimony of a deceased witness, cannot recollect the very words, he may state in his own language the facts detailed, as impressed on his mind at the time. Hepler v. Mt. Carmel Savings Bank, 39 R. 813.

109. Correcting answer. — The testimony taken down as required by law in felony cases should be read over to a witness, and corrected if wrong; if a disagreement as to his testimony takes place in the course of the trial, and the witness cannot be recalled, his testimony may be read, but if possible he must be recalled to repeat his testimony; the non-observance of these rules is not ordinarily a good ground for a new trial—each case resting upon its own peculiar circumstances. Conner v. State, 71 D. 184.

A witness was permitted to correct his testimony by stating, after having testified that a paper produced by him was a copy of a notice of protest sent to an indorser, that in respect to the direction, it was not a copy. Moses v. Ella, 82 D. 175.

110. Re-direct examination — On the re-direct examination of a witness after cross-examination, he may be examined, in the discretion of the judge, upon new matters. Clark v. Verce, 30 D. 53.

On the re-direct examination of a witness he cannot be questioned in reference to matters not inquired into on his cross-examination. Dutton v. Woodman, 57 D. 46.

111. Recalling and re-examining. — Permitting the re-examination of a witness is an exercise of discretion which the appellate court will not review. People v. Mather, 21 D. 122. When the object of recalling the witness is to lay the foundation for proving his declarations out of court, it must always be allowed; and if refused, and if proof of the witness's declarations be rejected because he had no previous opportunity of explanation, it is error. Cowanbean v. Hart, 60 D. 57.

It is not error to allow a witness to be recalled and examined with the view of laying a foundation for impeaching his testimony in chief by proof of contradictory statements. Scott v. Com., 83 D. 461.

Caveators are entitled to offer rebutting evidence only, after the caveatees have closed their case, and it is not error for the court to then refuse to admit testimony which was properly admissible upon the examination in chief of the witness. Higgins v. Carlton, 92 D. 666.

2. Refreshing the Memory.

112. The right to refer to memoranda.* — A witness may use a memorandum to refresh his memory. Holladay v. Marsh, 20 D. 678; Henderson v. Hsley, 49 D. 41; Riordan v. Davis, 29 D. 442. And such evidence is better than unaided recollection. Pearson v. Wightman, 12 D. 636.

Testimony based on a witness's own writing will be received, if, knowing the writing to be genuine, his mind is so convinced that he is, on that ground, enabled to swear positively to the fact therein stated; and this though he may not recognize the instrument as one he had seen before, or remember anything contained in it. Martin v. Good, 74 D. 545.

Employees in a hospital testified, in a capital case, to certain matters as within their recollection, refreshed by referring to the contemporaneous records of the hospital. The records were not produced in court, and the entries were not made by any of the witnesses. Held, no error. State v. Collins, 40 R. 697.

* Memoranda, use of, to refresh memory, see notes, 98 D. 619-623; 25 R. 54, 57.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

A disinterested witness who made the entries in a merchant's books may be examined on commission to prove an account, referring to the entries as memoranda to refresh his memory, but the merchant himself cannot be so examined, but must produce his books in court. Nicholson v. Withers, 13 D. 739.

In such a case it is not necessary that the entries should recall to the witness's memory the actual delivery of each specific article; it is sufficient if they enable him to say that he made them, and, therefore, that he delivered the articles at the time. Id.

An adverse party is entitled, for purpose of cross-examination, to examine a memorandum referred to by witness to refresh his memory; and the witness cannot refuse its production and examination, unless, perhaps, it appears to the court that he had a reasonable ground of belief that he would thereby subject himself to personal injury. State v. Bacon, 98 D. 616.

113. What writings or memoranda may be used.—The plaintiff's books of account cannot be used to refresh the memory of a witness unless the entries used for that purpose were made by the witness. Pargond v. Guice, 25 D. 202.

A witness in testifying as to the contents of a lost writing may use any memorandum, even though it be but a copy of a copy of the original writing, in order to refresh his memory. Dunlap v. Berry, 39 D. 413.

As an item of evidence, a blotter may be referred to by a witness, a salesman of a firm, to show that he had sent a bill copied therefrom to defendant, and to ascertain, by referring thereto, of what the bill consisted. Atwell v. Miller, 61 D. 294.

To allow a witness to refresh his memory by looking at a memorandum, it must have been made at the moment of the occurrence or recently after it; but if made weeks or months thereafter, he will not be allowed to do so. Spring Garden Mut. Ins. Co. v. Evans, 74 D. 555.

A witness will not be permitted to refresh his memory by looking at a memorandum made at the recommendation of one of the parties. Id.

A witness will not be permitted to testify to his belief of the correctness of facts set forth in an affidavit which he recognizes to be in his handwriting, but which was made nearly five months after the transaction, and at the request of the party producing him. Id.

A witness may use a memorandum not made by herself to refresh her memory, if, after seeing the memorandum, she is able to recall the facts and testify to them as matters of recollection. Hill v. State, 86 D. 736.

Entries upon the books of third persons of their daily transactions, made by persons whose duty it was to make them, and who testify to their correctness when made, but who have no remembrance of the transactions, are competent to be read in evidence; and it is no objection to their admission that they were first entered upon a slate by two persons during the day, and at night copied by one of them into the books, provided the original entries and copying are verified by the parties making them. State v. Skinborn, 88 D. 224.

A witness may refresh his memory by examining a memorandum made by himself, or known and recognized by him as stating the facts truly, when after such examination he can testify to the facts as matter of independent recollection; but the memorandum itself is not thereby made evidence. If the memory of the witness is not refreshed by an examination of the memorandum, so that he can testify to the facts as matter of independent recollection, but he can nevertheless testify that, at or about the time the memorandum was made, he knew its contents, and he knew them to be true, his testimony and the memorandum are both competent evidence; but if he did not know the contents of the memorandum to be true when it was made, although he saw it made, the memorandum is not admissible evidence. Acklen v. Hickman, 35 R. 54.

A newspaper reporter, called as a witness, may refresh his recollection as to an occurrence in his presence, by referring to the report of it printed from his statement made at the time. Com. v. Ford, 39 R. 426.

Where a railroad freight agent is required to testify as to the quantity of certain freight, and the times of receiving it, and testifies that he has no knowledge except that obtained from the way-bills in the office, he may testify from copies of such way-bills made by himself. Erie Preserving Co. v. Miller, 52 R. 607.

Where a witness swears that he made an entry of certain payments in dispute in a book, at the time, he may refresh his memory by a copy thereof recently made by himself. Calloway v. Varner, 54 R. 78.

4. Privilege to Refuse to Answer.

114. In what cases a witness may refuse to answer.—A witness in a criminal trial is not bound to disclose the names of the persons from whom he obtained information which led to the arrest of the accused. State v. Soper, 33 D. 665.

If the direct answer to a question will disgrace the witness, and fix a stain of infamy upon his character, he will be excused from responding to it, whether it be material or not to the merits of the cause. It is not sufficient that the answer may tend to expose him to infamy; it must be such as will directly show such infamy. People v. Mather, 21 D. 122.

On the trial of an indictment, the prisoner, who had testified for himself, was asked on cross-examination how many times he had been arrested. This was objected to by his counsel, as incompetent to affect his credibility, and as tending to degrade him, and it was claimed by counsel that he was privileged from answering. The objection was overruled. Held, error; that the prisoner's privilege was properly claimed for him by counsel, and the exception availed the prisoner as a party; and that the prisoner was privileged from answering. People v. Brown, 28 R. 183.

The privilege of a witness to refuse to give answers which will disgrace extends to a case where a woman, called to prove an attempt to produce an abortion upon her person, is asked questions tending to show that just previous to her becoming pregnant she had sexual intercourse with more men than one. Lohman v. People, 49 D. 340.

In an action for seduction the person seduced may refuse to testify as to criminal connection with others than the defendant, and witnesses may decline to testify as to their having had such criminal connection. Vaughn v. Perine, 4 D. 411.

In an action for falsely and maliciously representing to the treasury department of the United States that the plaintiff was intending to defraud the revenue, the plaintiff filed interrogatories requiring the defendant to answer whether he did not inform the department that he knew or believed that plaintiff was intending to commit a fraud upon the revenue. Held, that any communications of the kind to the department were privileged in the sense that their disclosure will not be compelled or permitted without the assent of the government, and that defendant would not be compelled to answer the interrogatories. Worthington v. Scribner, 12 R. 736.

Where the accused in a criminal trial becomes a witness in his own behalf, he cannot be compelled, on cross-examination, to disclose the confidential communications between himself and his attorney, nor can such disclosures be required of the attorney without the consent of the accused. Duttenhofer v. State, 32 R. 362. This rule applies, not only to judicial proceedings which have been contemplated or commenced, but to those which may by possibility become the subject of judicial inquiry. Bobo v. Bryson, 76 D. 406.

115. What matters he may be compelled to disclose.* — A witness upon an issue between other parties, and in which he has no interest, is bound to answer questions touching the issue in that cause, although the answer thereto may expose him to a civil action. Taney v. Kemp, 7 D. 673; Planters' Bank v. George, 12 D. 487.

A witness must answer questions, though the answers have a tendency to his disparagement or disgrace. State v. Patterson, 38 D. 699.

A witness summoned to give evidence before the grand jury may be compelled to answer questions propounded to him in reference to offenses committed in the county, unless the answers to such questions would criminate, or tend to criminate, himself. Ward v. The State, 22 D. 449.

A horse-race is a game, within the meaning of the Indiana statute compelling parties concerned in the transaction to testify against one indicted for gaming. Cheesum v. State, 44 D. 711.

Where two persons are engaged in a common criminal enterprise of uttering and publishing counterfeit bills, one of them may be questioned touching the part taken by the other in the passing or redemption of the bills. May v. State, 45 D. 548.

An accomplice becoming a witness for the people is not allowed the benefit of privileged communications, for in entering the witness-box to escape punishment himself, he contracts to give a full and complete statement of all that he and his associates may have done or said relative to the crime charged, no matter where or when done, or to whom said. Alderman v. People, 69 D. 321.

Where a party offers himself as a witness, he cannot refuse to answer questions on cross-examination as to any conversations with his counsel. Inhab. of Woburn v. Henshaw, 3 R. 333.

Fornication not being a penal offense, the plaintiff, examined as a witness on her own behalf in an action for her own seduction, may be required to testify concerning previous alleged acts of unchastity with others. Love v. Masoner, 32 R. 522.

Subject to the discretion of the court and to the witness's right to claim his privilege, he may be compelled to answer on cross-examination whether he had not been arrested for robbery. State v. Bacon, 57 R. 8.

116. Privilege as to self-criminating testimony.* — A witness either on the voir dire or on cross-examination is not bound to answer any question which would subject him to punishment, or render him infamous or disgraced. People v. Herrick, 7 D. 364; Ward v. State, 22 D. 449; Chamberlain v. Willson, 36 D. 356; State v. Staples, 90 D. 565; Ford v. State, 95 D. 658.

In an action for seduction, a female cannot, in Tennessee, be interrogated as to acts of unchastity with others, since in this state this would subject her to criminal punishment, though her general character for chastity is involved in the issue, and may be impeached by general evidence, and persons who have had criminal intercourse with her may be called to testify to the fact. Reed v. Williams, 73 D. 157.

A witness for the defense, in a prosecution for bastardy, cannot be compelled to testify whether he has ever had sexual intercourse with the prosecutrix, if he objects that the answer might tend to criminate him; nor can he be compelled to answer other questions tending to show that his claim of privilege was not well founded. Ford v. State, 95 D. 658.

A question that criminate, or tends to criminate, a witness, is one the answer to which will show, or tend to show, him guilty of a crime for which he is yet liable to be punished. People v. Mather, 21 D. 122.

If a witness discloses part of a transaction in which he was criminally concerned, without claiming his privilege as a witness, he is then bound to go forward and state the whole, especially where the facts disclosed are in favor of the party calling him. State v. Foster, 55 D. 191; Foster v. Pierce, 59 D. 152; Com. v. Price, 71 D. 668.

Where a witness has refused to answer a question upon the ground that his answer would tend to criminate himself, defendant may show by other and independent evidence that his answer would not or could not have that effect; and the witness will then be compelled to testify. Ford v. State, 95 D. 658.

An erroneous claim of a privilege from answering questions by a witness, in which he is sustained by the court, is cured by the subsequent offer of the witness to answer the questions. Com. v. Price, 71 D. 668.

The defendant in a criminal prosecution became a witness at his own request. Held, 1. That he thereby waived the constitutional provision that an accused person shall not be compelled to give evidence against himself; 2. That he could not refuse to answer questions put on cross-examination to discredit his direct evidence on the ground that answering would criminate himself; and 3. That the privilege from answering questions on the ground that they tend to criminate the witness is the privilege of the witness and not of his counsel. State v. Wentworth, 20 R. 688; State v. Ober, 13 R. 88; Com. v. Nichols, 19 R. 346.

Where the sale of liquor is made a criminal offense by the statute, the purchaser of the same is not guilty of a criminal act, and hence is not excused from testifying as to the purchase, on the ground that it would tend to criminate him. State v. Rand, 12 R. 127; Wakeman v. Chambers, 58 R. 218.

The provision in the declaration of rights, that no person shall "be compelled to accuse or furnish evidence against himself," applies to investigations before a legislative body, and protects a person from being compelled to disclose the circumstances of his offense, the sources from which, or the means by which, evidence of its commission, or of his connection with it, may be obtained; nor is such protection withdrawn by any statute which fails to secure such person from future liability and exposure to be prejudiced in any criminal proceeding against him as fully and extensively as he would be secured by availing himself of the privilege accorded by the constitutional provision. Emery's Case, 9 R. 22.

117. Privilege personal, and may be waived. — A witness may be asked a question, although the answer to it would tend to criminate or disgrace him, and he may refuse to answer such question; but his right to refuse is merely a privilege which he may waive. Fries v. Brugler, 21 D. 52. If he waive the privilege he must submit to a full cross-examination. Chamberlain v. Willson, 36 D. 356.

The privilege of a witness to refuse to answer a criminating question is exclusively personal, and where he is called as a witness against persons jointly indicted with himself for a crime, and does not object to testifying, the court is not required, upon objection by his co-defendants, to inform him that he is not bound to criminate himself. Com. v. Shaw, 50 D. 813.

One on trial for murder, testifying for himself, was asked on cross-examination if he had not been arrested for assault with intent to kill. The question was objected to, but the objection was overruled, and the prisoner answered without claiming his privilege. Held, no error. Hanoff v. State, 41 R. 496.

118. Whether court or witness shall decide tendency of answer to criminate. — It is for the witness and not the court to judge whether his answer to a question will tend to criminate him; if it will form one link in the chain of testimony against him, he is not bound to answer; and the court should so instruct him as to enable him to decide understandingly. State v. Edwards, 10 D. 557.

A statement by a witness, under oath, that he cannot testify without criminating himself, is sufficient proof of the same, unless the court is satisfied that the witness is mistaken, or acts in bad faith. Chamberlain v. Willson, 36 D. 356.

It is for the court to determine whether or not any direct answer to a question will furnish evidence against a witness. Ward v. The State, 22 D. 449; People v. Mather, 21 D. 122.

When a witness asks to be excused from answering, the court must determine whether the answer he may give can directly or indirectly criminate him, by furnishing evidence of his guilt, or by establishing one of several facts, which, together, form an ample chain of testimony to warrant his conviction, though this one fact could not of itself produce that result. People v. Mather, 21 D. 122.

If the answer may criminate the witness in the judgment of the court, then his privilege must be allowed without requiring him to explain how it will criminate him. Ib.

119. Witness not privileged when protected by statute. — A witness cannot refuse, on the ground of self-crimination, to answer a question relating to an offense already barred by the statute of limitations. Calhoun v. Thompson, 28 R. 754.

V. OPINIONS OF EXPERTS AND OTHERS.

120. Opinions of ordinary witnesses not admissible, generally. — Opinions of witnesses are never received as evidence where all the facts on which they are founded can be ascertained and made intelligible to the court or jury. Clark v. Fisher, 19 D. 402; Donnell v. Jones, 48 D. 59; Otis v. Thom, 58 D. 303.

The opinion of a person not of the medical profession is not evidence, unless the facts upon which it is based have come under his observation, and unless also he states those facts to the jury. Des v. Reagan, 33 D. 466.

An objection to a question by which a witness was asked whether, from his knowledge of said dog, he did or did not consider said dog a nuisance, is properly sustained. Parker v. Mize, 62 D. 776.

Insolvency is a legal conclusion; and a witness, although well acquainted with the affairs of an individual, cannot be permitted to testify that such individual was insolvent at a given time. Brice v. Lide, 68 D. 148.

Opinion of a witness as to "physical capacity" of testator to hold conversations, testified to by another witness as having taken place at a time when the witness whose opinion is asked was not present, is not competent evidence. Higgins v. Carlton, 92 D. 666.

121. Illustrations of the rule. — A witness cannot testify to his ownership of property as to an ultimate fact; he should state the facts upon which his claim of ownership depends. Dunlap v. Berry, 39 D. 413.

A witness having testified to a conversation, cannot testify as to what he understood to be meant by the language used. Hibbard v. Russell, 41 D. 733.

A witness cannot be examined as to the meaning of a plain word in a contract, for that is a question of law, determinable by the court. Collins v. Benbury, 42 D. 155.

It is a conclusion of law, and not a fact to be sworn to by a witness, that a person "unjustly and unlawfully" refuses to apply his property to the payment of his debts. Ex parte Clark, 45 D. 394.

The testimony of a witness as to what would be considered a good township is not admissible, it being a matter of opinion. Hammatt v. Emerson, 46 D. 598.

A witness, in an action for slander, having testified as to the words spoken by defendant, cannot state what meaning he understood the defendant to convey by the words. Snell v. Snow, 46 D. 730.

An opinion of a witness that parties are living in adultery is inadmissible; the witness must testify to facts. Cameron v. State, 48 D. 111.

An opinion of a witness as to whether a letter was written with a certain instrument found in a party's possession is inadmissible. Com. v. Webster, 52 D. 711.

When the precise words of a dying man are stated and offered in evidence, the impressions made on the mind of the witness, who was present and heard the statements made by the deceased, cannot be inquired into. Nelms v. State, 53 D. 94.

A witness's understanding as to what land a conversation referred to, where he testifies to hearing the plaintiff say that he had received pay "for the land," the question not being limited to his understanding from the conversation itself, the whole of which is given, is inadmissible. Marcy v. Stone, 54 D. 736.

Opinions of persons that a slave sold as sound was suffering from syphilis is not competent where such persons were not physicians. Lusk v. McDaniel, 57 D. 566.

A statement of a witness "that he thought if the steamboat had returned to the assistance of the flat-boat when the call for assistance was made the stage could have been saved," is mere matter of opinion, and therefore inadmissible. Otis v. Thom, 58 D. 303.

Witnesses cannot give their opinion as to whether the defendant, being tried for murder, would be caused to look for difficulty from the manner, language, and tone of voice of the deceased just previous to the homicide. They must testify what the manner, language, and tone of voice were. Keener v. State, 63 D. 269.

A witness cannot be asked whether he believed the deceased intended to kill the accused, from the conduct, countenance, and language of the deceased immediately preceding the homicide, in order to reduce the crime to manslaughter. Hawkins v. State, 71 D. 166.

A witness may testify whether an agreement was entered into between himself and another, but cannot be permitted to give his opinion as to whether what was said and done on a particular occasion amounted to an agreement. Odlin v. Goss, 77 D. 773.

Where a plaintiff attempts to prove that a flagman employed by a railroad company was an intemperate and incompetent person, the company may show that he was careful, attentive, and temperate, and this may be proved by witnesses who had seen his conduct, and it is not necessary that they be experts. Gahagan v. Boston etc. R. R. Co., 79 D. 724.

Opinions of witnesses relative to the duty of a tender of a draw-bridge are inadmissible in an action against him for injuries caused by the improper discharge of his duties. Nowell v. Wright, 80 D. 62.

On a trial for murder, the comparative strength of deceased and defendant is better proved by facts in detail of what occurred at the time of the homicide, as the grapple, scuffle, and the like, than by the opinion of the witness. Wise v. State, 85 D. 595.

The opinion of a witness as to the state of a party's title is not admissible in evidence. Winter v. Stock, 89 D. 57.

A question whether a witness could form an opinion from the appearance as to the capacity of an engine to draw a train is properly overruled where the witness is not claimed or shown to be an expert. Sisson v. Cleveland etc. R. R. Co., 90 D. 252.

In a trial for burglary the owner of the premises had described certain footprints to a witness. The witness was permitted to testify that the shoes of the defendant, produced on the trial, would have made such tracks. Held, error. Blunt v. State, 41 R. 666.

On a murder trial, evidence of experiments on targets by non-professional witnesses is incompetent to show that the deceased was killed by the close discharge of a gun. State v. Justus, 50 R. 470.

A witness may not give his opinion whether a shooting was accidental. State v. Vines, 53 R. 486.

On the question of the sufficiency of a fence to turn stock, non-expert witnesses may not give their opinion. Railroad Co. v. Shultz, 54 R. 805.

It is not competent, in an action of libel, to aid an innuendo by mere opinions of witnesses. Pittsburgh etc. Pass. R'y Co. v. McCurdy, 60 R. 363.

122. Limits and exceptions to the rule.* — A witness may be asked whether she knew whether or not the testator's eyesight was good enough to enable him, if his mind was right, to recognize her when near him. And a witness may testify that when he visited the testator, the latter would "look at him with a vacant stare," and that "his countenance and appearance indicated childishness." Irish v. Smith, 11 D. 648.

Opinions of witnesses are admissible in an action for a breach of a marriage contract, if founded upon observation, to show whether the plaintiff was attached to the defendant. McKee v. Nelson, 15 D. 384.

A master's testimony that a voyage was fair and lawful, and that the vessel was not engaged in illicit trade, states a matter of fact and not of law. Ocean Ins. Co. v. Francis, 19 D. 549.

The testimony of persons unlearned in the law that prior to 1791 it was customary for protestant settlers in the Spanish colony of Mississippi to be married by a justice of the peace, under a regulation to that effect adopted by the governor or superintendent, is admissible to uphold a marriage so celebrated, unless the party objecting thereto shows that better evidence is attainable. Phillips v. Gregg, 36 D. 158.

Opinions of witnesses are not evidence as a general rule; the rule, however, is not universal, and a witness on a trial for murder may be asked whether, when the deceased rushed upon the prisoner, there was time enough for the prisoner to escape and get out of the way or not. Stewart v. State, 53 D. 426.

A witness may testify as to the dangerous character of an excavation into which a party fell and was injured, although he was not present when the accident happened. The testimony of such a witness is not the assertion of a mere abstract opinion, but rather the assertion of a fact dependent in some measure upon opinion. Beatty v. Gilmore, 55 D. 514.

The testimony of a witness as to the apparent age of a child at a certain period is sufficient evidence, it seems, to prevent a non-suit depending on the question of such child's age. Robinson v. Blakely, 55 D. 703.

A witness may testify to the fact of ownership. Nelson v. Iverson, 60 D. 442.

Where, in a case of collision, the position of vessels and the character of the night are in evidence, it is proper to ask a witness whether a vessel, on such a night and in such a place, could be seen at a considerable distance from a vessel approaching the shore; and if so, how far. Innis v. Steamer Senator, 60 D. 577.

A witness should be permitted to testify as to "his understanding" of what he heard certain parties say in relation to an agreement between them. Printup v. Mitchell, 63 D. 258.

The general rule that a witness must state facts, and not his inference from them, seems to have an exception in cases of libel and slander, as the injury done in such cases depends upon the effect the words produced in the minds of hearers; and the way to determine this effect is to find out how the words were understood by hearers. Hawks v. Patton, 63 D. 266.

In an action for damages for injuries, a person not a physician may testify whether it was necessary for a party to receive med-local assistance, and the length of time such assistance was necessary. Chicago etc. R. R. Co. v. George, 71 D. 239.

That a witness may be unable to testify without an implied expression of opinion is no objection to his testimony upon questions relating to heights and distances, and as to the number, quantity, and dimensions of things. Eastman v. Amoskeag Mfg. Co., 82 D. 201.

A witness may legally testify as a matter of fact, that a seizure of property by an officer without lawful authority "was made in an offensive and insulting manner." Raisler v. Springer, 82 D. 736.

This question is proper in attacking a sale as being in fraud of creditors: "Did you see any difference in the appearance or management of things after the sale from that before the sale of the stage and horses to the plaintiff?" It does not call for the opinion of the witness. Gallagher v. Williamson, 83 D. 114.

The knowledge, belief, or intention of a witness may be given in evidence when it is a material fact, giving to the opposite party a liberal scope in the cross-examination; but in such a case the court should state to the jury that in judging of the knowledge, belief, or intention of the witness, they should consider all the facts and circumstances, and that the statement of the witness in that respect is not conclusive. Watson v. Chesire, 87 D. 382.

A witness may testify that a carriage appeared to start from a particular point, on knowledge derived from the sense of hearing, although the carriage was not seen by the witness. State v. Shinborn, 88 D. 224.

The opinions of witnesses, not experts, are sometimes admissible from necessity, and to prevent the failure of justice, as in questions of identity of person, handwriting, sounds, size, distance, and the like. But when the facts upon which the opinion is formed can be stated and described, they must be, and the jury be left to form their own opinion. Whittier v. Town of Franklin, 88 D. 185.

The testimony of a witness that a horse at the time of the accident did not appear to be frightened, but sulky, is admissible within the rule which admits opinions from necessity. Id.

Questions as to quantity, distance, or size, where there has been no measurement, always involve an estimate, and to that extent an opinion; but there is no legal objection to asking a witness who is acquainted with the position of two objects how far one is from the other, or to his answering that it is about half a mile, because he has never measured the distance. Baldwin v. Parker, 96 D. 698.

Any witness may testify as to the facts of which he has the means of knowledge, though his testimony may to some extent be an opinion or involve an estimate. Thus, where a will made in favor of the testator's second wife and her children was contested, upon the ground of undue influence and of insanity, by the children of the first wife, the second wife may testify as to the amount of her deceased husband's property, or of his debts, at the time of their marriage, and as to her kind treatment of her step-children. Id.

Plaintiff may testify that he understood defendant was personally liable upon a contract, although the contract was made by the defendant with the plaintiff's wife, as the plaintiff's servant or agent. Delano v. Goodwin, 97 D. 601.

Common observers, having a special opportunity for observation, may testify to their opinions as conclusions of fact although they are not experts, if the subject-matter to which the testimony relates cannot be reproduced or described to the jury precisely as it appeared to the witness at the time, and the facts upon which the witness is called to express his opinion are such as men in general are capable of comprehending and understanding. Com. v. Sturtivant, 19 R. 401.

Whether a witness, not an expert, is qualified to express his opinion as a conclusion of fact, is to be decided by the judge presiding at the trial; and his finding is not open to revision in this court, unless, upon a report of all the evidence, it is shown to be without foundation, or is based on some erroneous application of legal principles. Id.

On the trial of an indictment for murder, a witness, familiar with blood, who had examined with a lens a blood stain on a coat, when it was fresh, and who testified to its appearance at the time he examined it, and that it was not in the same condition at the trial, was permitted to testify that its appearance, when he examined it, indicated the direction from which it came, and that it came from below, upward, although he had never experimented with blood or other fluid in this respect. Held, that the admission of the testimony afforded no ground of exception. Id.

At the trial of an indictment for murder, a witness who, soon after the homicide, had taken a pair of shoes from the defendant's house, one of which, as the government contended, fitted a track supposed to have been made by the murderer, was permitted to testify that the shoes appeared as if they had recently been washed. Held, that the admission of this testimony afforded no ground of exception. Id.

Where the intention of a person becomes material, such person, being otherwise competent as a witness, may testify to that intention, unless prevented by some controlling principle of law applicable to the particular case. Moore v. Davis, 6 R. 460; Kerrains v. People, 19 R. 158.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

On the trial of an indictment for assault with a deadly weapon with intent to kill, defendant was asked as to his intent in procuring the weapon. Held, competent. Kerrains v. People, 19 R. 158.

The disposition of a person may be proved as a fact by a witness who knows what the disposition in question is, from his own personal observation. State v. Lee, 21 R. 769.

A non-expert witness is competent to testify that certain stains were blood. Greenfield v. People, 39 R. 636.

In a proceeding to establish a public ditch, a non-expert witness, having stated the number of acres in the vicinity of the ditch, and given its size and location, may state how many acres would be benefited by its construction, and what effect, if any, the drainage would have upon the public health. Bennett v. Meehan, 43 R. 78.

Witnesses who saw a woman thrown down by the starting of a street-car after she had alighted from it, may give their opinion as to whether she had time to get clear of it. Ward v. Charleston City R'y Co., 45 R. 794.

Non-expert opinions as to the health and physical condition of another, based upon personal knowledge, are competent. Carthage Turnpikes Co. v. Andrews, 52 R. 653.

On a question of footprints and an alleged peculiar structure of the defendant's feet, evidence on the part of the defendant, by witnesses who had recently or immediately before examined his feet, is competent. Lipes v. State, 54 R. 402.

123. Opinions as to foreign laws.* — In proof of the laws of a foreign country, the testimony of any person, whether a professed lawyer or not, who appears to be well informed on this point, is competent. Hall v. Costello, 2 R. 207.

A person offered as a witness and expert in foreign law may state the written law without producing it, and he may produce a copy of the statutes or code of the foreign country, and refer to the same, for the purpose of refreshing his recollection as to the law. Barroes v. Downs, 11 R. 283.

A Spanish lawyer, who had practiced law in Cuba, was allowed to testify from a printed copy of the Spanish code of commerce as to the laws regulating special partnerships in Cuba. Id.

124. Admissibility of opinions on questions of value. — A witness may be asked his opinion of the value of certain mortgaged land at the time of the entry of judgment on the bond. Kellogg v. Krauser, 16 D. 480.

Persons who have owned, commanded, and repaired vessels are, although not ship-carpenters, competent to testify as to the difference between the value of a vessel repaired in a certain way, and her value had she been repaired in the manner called for by the contract under which the repairs were made. Sikes v. Paine, 51 D. 389.

The value of articles of baggage lost by a carrier may be proved by a dealer in such articles from a description given; or the jurors may have a proper measure of damages in their own knowledge of values. Ill. Cent. R. R. Co. v. Copeland, 76 D. 749.

The opinion of a witness as to the value of property seized on execution is inadmissible in an action against a sheriff for making an insufficient levy; the amount brought at the sheriff's sale of the property is ordinarily the best evidence of its value in such an action. French v. Snyder, 83 D. 193.

The opinion of a witness as to the value of land in a controversy is properly excluded, where the only evidence of his being qualified to express an opinion is his own statement that he knew the value, and was competent to state it. Flint v. Flint, 83 D. 615.

A witness may be asked to state the difference in value between a horse as represented and as actually existing, where the witness knew the horse, and is skilled in judging of the value of horses. Haskell v. Mitchell, 89 D. 711.

In an action to recover damages for the breach of a contract to convey lands, where it is sought to prove their value by showing the worth of adjacent lands, either of the same or of a different quality, any person knowing the property and its value may testify upon that question. The proof of value need not be confined to persons only who are engaged in buying and selling real estate. Such knowledge is not scientific, and is not confined to a few experts. White v. Hermann, 99 D. 543.

A witness who is purchasing wheat with reference to a particular market, is buying and selling in that market, and is kept informed as to the prices by circulars and correspondence, is competent to testify as to the value of wheat in that market. Brackett v. Edgerton, 100 D. 211.

A non-expert witness, familiar with the facts, may testify as to the relative value of services and commodities entering into a mutual account. Johnson v. Thompson, 37 R. 152.

A witness is incompetent to testify in North Carolina to market values at Boston, Mass., when his knowledge is exclusively derived from market reports in a newspaper published in North Carolina. Fairley v. Smith, 42 R. 522.

A witness may not give an opinion as to the public utility of a ditch, nor as to the amount of damage it will cause to a party's land, but he may give his opinion as to the value of the land with and without the ditch. Yost v. Conroy, 47 R. 156.

In an action against a carrier for the loss of a ring, the plaintiff, a woman, whose husband had given her the ring, and who did not know its cost or value, nor the value of pearls, was allowed to point out a pearl of corresponding size, color, and general appearance, and an expert was then allowed to state the value of the pearl pointed out. Held, competent. Barney v. Dinmore, 55 R. 445.

Any person of ordinary intelligence is competent to testify to the value of a seal-skin coat, although he may never have seen one bought or sold. State v. Finch, 59 R. 443.

On a prosecution for theft of a seal-skin cloak, which the owner had worn, she may testify to its value, having priced similar articles. Printz v. People, 36 R. 437.

125. — or genuineness. — Persons other than the officers of a bank are competent witnesses to prove that a bill, which purports to have been issued by such bank, is a counterfeit. State v. Tutt, 21 D. 508.

The opinion of a witness that a bill is counterfeit is admissible in evidence, although such witness has never seen the officers of the bank write, and recognizes their signatures only from his general acquaintance with the bills of such bank. Id.

A witness is not competent to testify to the genuineness of a bank note who has never seen a genuine note of that bank, but whose knowledge of its notes is derived from facsimiles engraved or descriptions printed in a bank reporter or directory. State v. Brown, 70 D. 168.

A witness skilled in the marks and characteristics of a genuine bank bill, from long experience, and from having studied the modes by which counterfeit bank bills can be detected, is competent to testify as to the genuineness of a bank bill shown to and examined by him, although he does not know the signatures of the president or cashier of the bank. Jones v. Finch, 75 D. 73.

126. — or amount of damage. — The opinion of a witness as to the amount of damages is not admissible. He must state facts, and let the jury assess the damages. Fish v. Dodge, 47 D. 254.

Witnesses who are not experts, in a prosecution for a nuisance in erecting and maintaining a mill-dam, cannot testify as to what effect an overflow caused thereby had upon the public health in that vicinity. Luning v. State, 52 D. 153.

A witness cannot give his opinion as to the amount of damages which a land-holder will sustain by reason of a railroad passing over his land, in an action by a railroad company to condemn and appropriate the same. Atlantic etc. R. R. Co. v. Campbell, 64 D. 607.

The opinions of witnesses who testify that they are acquainted with the effect which privies and sties have upon the air about them, that they have examined the premises as to their nature and condition, are competent evidence as to whether or not such privies and sties are nuisances, and whether they must or would make plaintiff's house uncomfortable. Kearney v. Farrell, 73 D. 677.

In an action on an attachment bond, a witness may testify to the extent of a merchant's business, and the rate or average of his net profits, if within his knowledge, but may not give his opinion as to the loss he will suffer by the breaking up of his business; nor is it competent to show that by reason of the stopping of his business he lost advances that he had made, and possible profits on shipments of merchandise. Pollock v. Gantt, 44 R. 519.

In an action of breach of promise of marriage, the plaintiff's neighbors and intimate friends may testify as to their opinion of the amount of damage she had sustained. Jones v. Fuller, 45 R. 761.

127. — on questions of sanity.* —

1. Generally. — The opinion of a non-professional witness, on a question of insanity, may be given in evidence, in connection with the facts upon which it is founded, and as derived from them, although an opinion founded upon facts proved by other witnesses is inadmissible. Mores v. Crawford, 44 D. 349; Grant v. Thompson, 10 D. 119; Doe v. Reagan, 33 D. 466; Clark v. State, 40 D. 481; Maxwell v. Harrison, 52 D. 385.

The opinions of witnesses as to what is undue and unnatural excitement in time of battle cannot generally afford ground for safe conclusions as to a person's mental condition years afterwards, and are therefore inadmissible, unless it appears that the excitement actually mastered the intellect and deprived the person of accountability. People v. Garbutt, 97 D. 162.

Witnesses who are not experts cannot give their opinion on the question of sanity. State v. Pike, 6 R. 533.

2. Sanity of a testator. — The opinions of witnesses, other than physicians and the subscribing witnesses to a will, considered merely as opinions, are not evidence, but such witnesses, having stated the appearance, conduct, conversation, and other particular facts from which the state of the testator's mind may be inferred, are always at liberty to state their inferences, conclusion, or opinion, as the result of these facts. Potts v. House, 50 D. 329; Rambler v. Tryon, 10 D. 444; Kinne v. Kinne, 21 D. 732; Clapp v. Fullerton, 90 D. 631; Pidcock v. Potter, 8 R. 181; Hardy v. Merrill, 22 R. 441.

After a non-professional witness has stated the facts upon which his opinion is founded, he may be permitted to state his opinion as to the sanity or insanity of a testator. Pidcock v. Potter, 8 R. 181.

It is not necessary to lay a foundation for the admission of the testimony of witnesses to a will, as to their opinion of the testator's

* Opinion of non-expert on question of insanity, see notes, 8 R. 184-195; 6 D. 59-61.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

sanity, by proving all the facts from which the opinion is formed. Robinson v. Adams, 16 R. 473.

Subscribing witnesses to a will may testify to the opinion they formed of the testator's mind at the time of executing the will, the law placing them around the testator to try, judge, and determine whether he is compos to execute it. Potts v. House, 50 D. 329; Clapp v. Fullerton, 90 D. 681. And they may do so without having previously testified to any facts as the ground of it, but other witnesses may not. Tilow v. Tilow, 93 D. 691.

Although the opinion of a witness as to the sanity of a testator is admissible, the question, "From your knowledge of him, would you think his mind sound enough to make a will?" is objectionable, as it involves a question of law for the court to determine, and not the witness, as to the quantum of mental capacity necessary to enable a party to make a legal disposition of his estate. Turrell v. Brennan, 82 D. 137.

The opinion of a witness as to the sanity of a testator must relate to the time of his examination, and his opinion at a period anterior cannot be called for upon the direct examination. Ryan v. Price, 86 D. 459.

A witness cannot be asked his opinion as to the capacity of a testator to make a will. Such inquiry involves a matter of law, and also assumes that the witness knows the degree of capacity required to perform the act in issue. Ib.

128. — or identity. — The opinions of witnesses that a libel refers to the plaintiff, though it does not name him, are admissible. Miller v. Butler, 52 D. 768.

129. — or handwriting. — The "handwriting" of a party includes whatever he has written with his hand, though not in his usual or ordinary chirography. Com. v. Webster, 52 D. 711.

An opinion as to whether anonymous letters are in defendant's handwriting, though disguised, from a witness who knows his handwriting, is competent. Ib.

A witness may give reasons for his opinions as to handwriting in a paper exhibited to him as being that of the prisoner. Ib.

The rule requires that a witness called to prove handwriting shall testify from having seen the person write, or from a knowledge of his hand acquired from writings acknowledged by the party. Bruce v. Crews, 99 D. 467; Pope v. Askew, 35 D. 729; People v. Spooner, 43 D. 672; U. S. v. Simpson, 24 D. 331; Johnson v. Davenport, 10 D. 198. Independent of any skill in penmanship, or in judging of it, on the witness's part. Commonwealth v. Webster, 52 D. 711. And the fact that such witness had seen the party write but once does not go to the competency or admissibility of his evidence, but only to the weight which should be given to it by the jury. Cross v. People, 95 D. 474. And the rule is the same in this respect in criminal as in civil cases. Hammond's Case, 11 D. 39.

If a witness has previous knowledge of handwriting from having seen the party write, or from authentic papers, derived in the course of business, he may, in corroboration of his testimony, compare the writing in question with other signatures known to be genuine. Clark v. Wyatt, 77 D. 90.

In a prosecution for fraudulently passing a counterfeit bank note, proof of the handwriting of the person, whose signature is alleged to have been forged, may be made by one who has seen him write, or who has received letters, in the course of correspondence, of such a nature as to make it highly probable that he wrote them, or who has inspected ancient genuine documents bearing his signature; but one who has no knowledge on the subject except what he has derived from receiving and passing other bank notes, purporting to have been signed by such person, believing them to be genuine, is not a competent witness. State v. Allen, 9 D. 616.

The handwriting of a surveyor long deceased, in a particular plat of survey, may be proved by a witness who has acquired his knowledge by examining many plats of surveys, purporting to have been made by the same surveyor. Jones v. Huggins, 17 D. 567.

In Ohio the evidence of the person whose name it is alleged has been forged is admissible to prove that the name appearing upon the instrument is not his genuine signature. Hess v. State, 22 D. 767.

The testimony of a witness as to the contents of a letter is inadmissible, where it appears that the witness had never seen the alleged author of the letter write, and had no knowledge of his handwriting. Dorsey v. Dorsey, 6 D. 506.

A witness who had never see the defendant write, and had no means of judging of the character of his handwriting, further than that he had once received a letter purporting to have been written by the defendant, which letter the defendant denied writing, is not a competent witness as to the defendant's handwriting. Pope v. Askew, 35 D. 729.

No one is competent to testify as to the genuineness of a signature who is not acquainted with the signer's handwriting from seeing him write, or from frequently seeing specimens of it, or from a comparison before the jury of the questionable handwriting with specimens of it, produced, admitted, or clearly proved to be not only genuine, but not got up for the occasion. State v. Brown, 70 D. 168.

A witness is incompetent to testify to genuineness of handwriting who is acquainted with it only from printed descriptions and fac-similes. Ib.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume I.

A witness called to prove a person's handwriting, who has never seen the party write, and whose knowledge of his hand was derived from having read letters which came to a business house in which he was a clerk, purporting to come from the party, but which letters were not in reply to any letters witness had written or seen written, is incompetent. His knowledge is simply hearsay. Bruce v. Crews, 99 D. 467.

A witness cannot be allowed to give his opinion on a question of disputed handwriting, when his knowledge was acquired in the proceedings in the suit, and was based solely on comparison and admissions. Hynes v. McDermott, 37 R. 538.

180. Comparison of handwriting.—Witnesses having a knowledge of a party's handwriting are competent to testify as to its genuineness, but not to make a comparison of hands, for that is the province of the jury. Travis v. Brown, 82 D. 540.

An opinion of a witness formed from the mere comparison of hands as to whether two signatures were written by the same person, is inadmissible. People v. Spooner, 43 D. 672. S. P., Tomew. Parkersburg R. R. Co., 17 R. 540.

The most satisfactory mode of proving handwriting, where the writer is incompetent to testify, is by a witness who saw the writing executed and is able to identify it; and next to this is the testimony of persons who have seen the party write or have had access to or possession of his writings. And this latter mode, though it involves a comparison, is not subject to the objection that it is proof by comparison of hands. Hanley v. Gandy, 91 D. 315.

Proof of a writing by comparison of hands consists of placing before a witness, who has had no previous acquaintance with the handwriting of the party, a writing which is admitted or proved to be genuine, and the writing in question, and calling upon him to state from the comparison whether the writings were executed by the same person. Id.

A witness called to prove a copy of a lost letter claimed to have been in the handwriting of a certain person cannot be shown letters already proven to have been written by such person, and testify whether the lost letter was in the same hand. This is not the case of an expert testifying from a comparison of papers all before the court, but a case of educating the witness up to the point of competency. Bruce v. Crews, 99 D. 467.

Comparison is competent as a means of ascertaining the genuineness of handwriting, when introduced in aid of doubtful original proof or when the evidence is conflicting, and the witnesses making the comparison need not be expert. Benedict v. Flanigan, 44 R. 583.

A witness, who had sworn that a signature in question was not in the defendant's handwriting, was shown, on cross-examination, a letter admitted to be in the defendant's writing, and on a subject foreign to the case, for the sole purpose of refreshing his memory. Held, that the plaintiff's counsel was entitled to ask him if he was still of the same opinion. Nat. Bank of Chester Co. v. Armstrong, 59 R. 156.

On the issue as to the genuineness of a signature, it is not competent, on cross-examination, to submit to the witness simulated signatures and require his opinion as to their genuineness. Ross v. First Nat. Bank, 60 R. 258.

181. What may be proved by expert testimony.*—1. What are subjects of such testimony.—The admissibility of opinions of skilled witnesses is confined, in general, to cases where, from the nature of the subject, facts disconnected from such opinions cannot be so presented to the jury as to enable them to pass upon the question with the requisite knowledge and judgment. Newmark v. L. & L. F. & L. I. Co., 77 D. 608.

The opinions of witnesses are admissible if the connection between the fact and its experienced consequences lies within the limits of some art or science, and the witnesses are skilled in such art or science. Hartford P. I. Co. v. Harmer, 59 D. 684.

The opinions of witnesses experienced in river navigation as to whether or not the situation of a vessel which had run aground was such as to preclude any reasonable expectation or chance of relieving her by the use of spars and anchors, and to justify the master in not resorting to such means, are competent evidence in an action for loss of goods jettisoned to relieve a vessel so situated. Bentley v. Bustard, 63 D. 561.

In an action against a railroad company to recover for injuries sustained by a passenger,—held, 1. That evidence of the attending physician was admissible as to what effect the injuries would have upon the future condition of plaintiff, and as to how the injuries had affected his mind, although there was no declaration that the injuries had been willful; 2. That the phrase "extraordinary care," in the charge to the jury, was equivalent to "greatest care," "utmost care," the "highest degree of care," that being the degree of care legally required in his case. Toledo etc. R. R. Co. v. Baddeley, 5 R. 71.

Experts may be allowed to give their opinions as to the value of dogs, the opinions being based either on actual sales, or their general observations and experience. Canling v. Hannibal etc. R. R. Co., 14 R. 476.

opinions of competent and experienced men are admissible on the question whether the cotton-gin was as warranted. Scattergood v. Wood, 35 R. 515.

2. What are not. — The opinions of witnesses engaged in an insurance business, that the fact that a building insured had shortly before the risk was taken been on fire, was material to the risk, and would have influenced the judgment of a prudent underwriter, are inadmissible in an action upon the policy. Hartford P. I. Co. v. Harmer, 59 D. 684.

The opinion of a physician with whom another physician studied his profession, as to whether he possessed "more than ordinary skill of members of his profession, judging from his acquaintance with them," is not competent evidence. Leighton v. Sargent, 64 D. 323.

Expert evidence is incompetent if the facts proposed to be proved are within the common experience of mankind; as to show that the failure to occupy buildings insured increased the risk. Mulry v. Mohawk Valley Ins. Co., 66 D. 380.

A witness cannot testify as an expert, nor at all, as to whether certain specified facts would increase the rates of insurance upon property insured, as the question involved is not one relating to matters of science or skill, but calls for the opinion of the witness upon the influence which certain facts would have upon others, and whether they would be induced thereby to charge higher rates of premium. Joyce v. Maine Ins. Co., 71 D. 536.

It requires no special skill or experience to answer whether the master of a vessel would "probably know that his foremast was sprung, his trysail split, and his standing rigging in such condition as to need replacing," and a question to that effect to an expert is consequently inadmissible. Perkins v. Augusta Ins. & B. Co., 71 D. 654.

The testimony of experts in real estate values that the stoppage of defendant's works would materially diminish the value of plaintiff's property, in an action against the owners of a large mill for maintaining a nuisance by operating their works, is inadmissible, although plaintiff has introduced evidence to the effect that the operation of their works has reduced the rental value of her property. Wesson v. Washburn Iron Co., 90 D. 181.

The opinion of a broker is not admissible as to the certainty that stock could have been purchased at the quotation prices, at a certain time, in an action against a telegraph company for its failure to transmit a message to brokers, ordering the purchase of certain stocks. U. S. Telegraph Co. v. Wenger, 93 D. 751.

The words "original owners," in a prospectus of a corporation to be formed, importing that no profits would be added to prices paid for their lands on account of any intermediate party between it and the precedent owners, and excluding the idea of purchase at speculative prices, are not terms of art, science, or trade, requiring the aid of experts to explain. Simons v. Vulcan Oil and M. Co., 100 D. 628.

A policy of fire insurance on a dwelling-house provided that any increase of the risk, by the act, or with the knowledge or consent of the assured, avoided the policy. The assured allowed the dwelling-house to remain unoccupied for some time, when a loss by fire occurred. Held, that the opinions of experts as to whether leaving a dwelling-house unoccupied for a considerable length of time was an increase of risk was inadmissible, the question being within common knowledge; also, that the testimony of the company's agent that it was their custom to charge extra premiums upon such unoccupied dwelling-houses was inadmissible, although the testimony of witnesses having the requisite knowledge and experience, that it was the custom of insurance companies generally to charge extra premiums upon unoccupied dwelling-houses, was admissible. Luce v. Dorchester Mut. Ins. Co., 7 R. 522.

An expert witness, who has made a study of human hair, on being shown hair from the head of the victim of a murder, and hair found with blood on it on a wheelbarrow belonging to the accused, may not be permitted to give his opinion, founded only on the ordinary appearance of the hair, that the two were from the same head. Knoll v. State, 42 R. 704.

The following have been held not to be subjects of expert opinion: The proper time to burn a fallow. Ferguson v. Hubbell, 49 R. 544.

The opinion of a fire marshal as to the cause of a fire. Cook v. Johnson, 55 R. 703.

Whether it is negligent not to put out a plank for passengers to embark on a steamboat, and to try to embark without a plank. Clinton v. Root, 55 R. 671.

Whether leaving a horse unhitched in a mill-yard is careful and prudent. Stowe v. Bishop, 56 R. 569.

132. Competency and qualifications of experts, generally. — Persons of skill are permitted to give their opinions in evidence on questions of art, science, or trade, on the ground that they are conversant with the business to which they are called to testify, and have, therefore, peculiar knowledge concerning it. Sibes v. Paine, 51 D. 385; Jones v. Finch, 75 D. 73.

A witness is not qualified to testify as an expert as to the expectation of life at a certain age, where he has had but an experience of six months as a life insurance agent. Donaldson v. Miss. etc. R. R. Co., 87 D. 391.

A Roman Catholic priest, regularly educated and officiating as such, and required by the duties of his office to pass his judgment upon the mental condition of invalids and dying persons, to the end that he may administer the sacraments only to those whose minds are in a proper state to reason or act of their own volition, is an expert as to the sanity of a person whom he so attends. Estate of Toomes, 35 R. 83.

In proving a foreign written law, it is safer to require production of such law itself as a guide, when, if difficulties arise in expounding it, testimony may be called in for the purpose of making the exposition. But the witness called for such purpose must be an expert. A witness who merely testifies that he had been a policeman and constable in another state, and that, on account of a difficulty which he had had with his wife, he had looked into the laws of that state, is not competent either to prove what that law is or to expound it. People v. Lambert, 72 D. 49.

133. — of experts as to handwriting.* — Persons skilled in a knowledge of handwriting may give their opinions in evidence formed from a comparison of hands, as to whether the writing in question is genuine or not, although they never saw the party write whose signature is in controversy. Moody v. Rowell, 28 D. 317. S. P., Hess v. State, 22 D. 767; May v. State, 45 D. 548; Miles v. Loomis, 31 R. 470.

So the opinions of such persons are admissible as evidence, formed merely from an inspection of the contested signature, as to whether it is a free, natural, and genuine hand, or a stiff, artificial, and imitated one. Moody v. Rowell, 28 D. 317.

The testimony of experts in handwriting as to the genuineness of a signature from a mere inspection of the writing, without previous knowledge of the party's handwriting, has been sometimes admitted, but the weight of authority is against it. People v. Spooner, 43 D. 672.

A clerk in chancery is not necessarily an expert in handwriting, whose opinions as to the genuineness of a signature are admissible in evidence, though he testifies that he has been accustomed to examine signatures as to their genuineness. Ib.

Expert testimony is admissible as corroborative of direct testimony to prove that the whole of an instrument was written by the same hand, with the same pen and ink, and at the same time. Fulton v. Hood, 75 D. 664.

A photographer is qualified to give an opinion as an expert, concerning the genuineness of a disputed signature, where he has been accustomed to examine handwriting in connection with his business, with a view to detect forgeries; and this, though his opinion be based in part on enlarged photographic copies, made by himself, of the disputed signature and of admitted genuine signatures of the same person, which he testifies are accurate copies except as to size and color. Marcy v. Barnes, 77 D. 405.

Experts may be examined to prove forged or simulated writings, and to give conclusions of skill, but not to make comparisons with other authenticated papers, and express opinions from the comparisons. Travis v. Brown, 82 D. 540.

An expert may testify that entries in a hotel register, seen and examined by him, were in the handwriting of the person who wrote certain other signatures produced and proved or admitted to be the defendant's, although such entries were not before the jury, having been destroyed by the defendant himself, in order to suppress the evidence. State v. Skinborn, 88 D. 224.

The testimony of an expert may be received to prove a signature by comparison, although there has been no evidence from any person acquainted with such signature. Ib.

The genuineness of the signature to a lost instrument may be testified to by an expert who had examined the signature, and who testifies from his recollection of the signature as compared with genuine signatures in evidence. Abbott v. Coleman, 31 R. 186.

An expert who has no knowledge of a handwriting in dispute, except from having seen the alleged penman write several times, and that only for the purpose of testifying, is incompetent to give an opinion thereof. Reese v. Reese, 35 R. 634.

On the question of the genuineness of the signature of a note in suit, an expert witness, who has never seen the defendant write, may not testify to his opinion founded on a comparison with the defendant's signature on the plea in the suit. Springer v. Hall, 53 R. 598.

A witness cannot be allowed to give his opinion as an expert on a question of disputed handwriting, founded on a comparison of the disputed signature with photographic copies of other writings not in evidence, and the accuracy of which is not shown by extrinsic testimony. Hynes v. McDermott, 37 R. 533.

The age of a writing is not a proper subject of expert opinion. Cheney v. Dunlap, 57 R. 823.

For Index to Notes in American Decisions and American Reports, see Volume L.

184. — of physicians and surgeons.* — Physicians are allowed to give their opinion as to the sanity of a testator, from the symptoms and circumstances which came within their own observation, or as testified to by others. Potts v. House, 50 D. 329.

Men of medical skill who have no personal knowledge of the facts may be asked their opinions whether certain appearances detailed by other witnesses are symptoms of insanity. Doe v. Reagan, 33 D. 466; Cem. v. Rogers, 41 D. 458.

Evidence by a medical expert as to his opinion of sanity or insanity of a prisoner, founded upon his appearance while on trial, should be admitted. McAllister v. State, 52 D. 180.

A medical witness may be allowed to express an opinion, from an examination made in July, whether the accused was insane in the preceding March. Freeman v. People, 47 D. 216.

A physician may testify as an expert to the pregnancy of a deceased, and may give his reasons for his belief, after having made a post-mortem examination of the body, on the trial of an indictment for murder caused by an attempt to procure an abortion. State v. Smith, 54 D. 578.

A physician may give his opinion of the cause of a decedent's death, after having made a post-mortem examination of the body, on the trial of an indictment for murder caused by an attempt to procure an abortion. Id.

A practicing physician is a competent witness as a medical expert, even though he is not a graduate of any medical college or institution, and has no license to practice medicine. New Orleans etc. R. R. Co. v. Albritton, 75 D. 98.

A physician cannot testify as an expert in relation to the effects upon the health of breathing illuminating gas, if he has had no experience of such effects, although he may have been in practice for several years. Emerson v. Lowell Gas Light Co., 83 D. 621.

The testimony of medical men as to the permanency of a personal injury is not incompetent in an action for damages for negligently causing such injury. Buel v. New York Central R. R. Co., 88 D. 271.

The opinions of physicians as to the nature of an affection complained of, its cause, and the probability of its being cured, are admissible, though based upon the facts as proved by other witnesses, in an action for causing personal injuries. Mattison v. New York Central R. R. Co., 91 D. 67.

A physician asked to give his opinion as to the cause of a patient's condition at a particular time must necessarily be guided to some extent in forming his opinion by what the sick person may have told him in detailing his pains and sufferings, and his opinion founded in part upon such data may be received in evidence; and he may even state what his patient said in describing his bodily condition, if it be said under such circumstances as free it from all suspicion of being spoken with reference to future litigation and give it the character of res gestæ. Ill. Cent. R. R. Co. v. Sutton, 92 D. 81.

The testimony of physicians that it would be impossible for any one to identify a human head after preservation for a certain time in alcohol is not admissible, for it is a conclusion from facts which can be drawn by the jury alone. It would be competent, however, for the witnesses to state the character and nature of the change produced by death, and to explain or illustrate to what extent these changes had operated upon the head in question. State v. Vincent, 95 D. 753.

A physician not an expert on the subject of insanity may testify as to the mental condition of a patient when he has had adequate opportunity to form an opinion, but cannot qualify himself to testify by a single examination. Inhab. of Fayette v. Inhab. of Chester-ville, 52 R. 741.

185. — and other scientific men.* — A surveyor who testifies as to his knowledge of marks made by a former surveyor, does not testify as an expert, but merely as a witness to facts within his knowledge, and his testimony is to be received by the jury only so far as they believe that he is able, from his personal knowledge, to identify such marks. Barron v. Cobleigh, 35 D. 505.

A surveyor's opinion as that of a man of skill and science may be admitted in evidence for the purpose of showing that marks on a tree, claimed as a corner, were corner or line marks, but not to show that this was the corner or line between adjoining tracts of land. Clegg v. Fields, 75 D. 450.

A millwright and civil engineer is competent as an expert to give an opinion as to the effect upon the water in the factory flume and upon the machinery in the factory by opening and shutting gates conducting water therefrom, where he has been employed for many years in the construction of mills and factories. Hammond v. Woodman, 66 D. 219.

186. — of mechanics.† — A practical brick-mason, who had been engaged in the construction of a wall between plaintiff's land and the street, is competent to give his opinion as an expert upon the capacity of the wall to withstand the flow of rain-water on the inner side of the wall upon the plaintiff's land, in an action against a city for the undermin-

137. — and persons skilled in a particular trade or vocation. * — The opinions of underwriters, who had no particular knowledge in regard to the erection of steam saw-mills, are not admissible to prove that the inclosure of the boiler in a particular manner materially increased the risk. Jefferson Ins. Co. v. Cotheal, 22 D. 567.

Persons of skill may give their opinions in evidence when, from the nature of the case, facts disconnected from such opinions cannot be given to the jury to enable them to pass upon the question with the requisite knowledge and judgment. Ib.

The opinions of merchants as to the liability of banks taking notes for collection, however general, cannot vary the legal liability of such banks, but are admissible to show the common understanding as to the meaning of such contracts, and to prove a usage. Allen v. Merchants' Bank, 34 D. 289.

The testimony that a bill is a counterfeit, from merchants who have been in the habit of receiving and paying away genuine bills on the same bank, is competent. Watson v. Oresap, 36 D. 572.

A witness may give an opinion as to the capacity of a person as a millwright, founded on work done by such person, where the witness is a mill-owner of twenty-five or thirty years' experience. Doster v. Brown, 71 D. 153.

In an action by a railroad company against an officer for storage of cars attached by him, and left on his premises, freight agents of other railroads are competent to testify as to the proper charge for such storage, though not experts in a technical sense. Fitchburg R. R. Co. v. Freeman, 74 D. 600.

A witness of a long railroad experience cannot be allowed to give his opinion whether the loud and sudden sounding of a steam-whistle was, under all the circumstances of the particular case, reasonable and prudent, or otherwise; nor is it competent to ask him whether or not similar signals were given by other railroad companies. Hill v. Portland etc. R. R. Co., 92 D. 601.

In an action against a town for injury to a horse by a defect in a highway in the winter, the defense was that the horse was improperly shod. The shoes were exhibited to the jury, and a witness, a blacksmith, was allowed to give his opinion that they were put on for summer use and were too dull for winter use. Held, no error. Beards v. Middlebury, 38 R. 707.

for the purpose of reviving his recollection of the facts of the case. Riordon v. Davis, 29 D. 442.

A medical expert having testified in general to his belief in a prisoner's insanity, may be asked, on cross-examination, whether he believed that the prisoner was able to distinguish right from wrong, and that it was wrong to commit murder, arson, rape, or burglary. Clark v. State, 40 D. 481.

Where in an action for damages for injury sustained by plaintiff's garden and nursery from smoke, heat, and gas from defendant's brick-kiln, two witnesses, being experienced gardeners, had testified to the injury that such smoke, heat, and gas had caused, they were asked, "what was the amount of damage" by the injury of which they had before testified, and it was held a proper question. Vandine v. Burpee, 46 D. 733.

An insurance expert may be asked whether a risk was increased by a partition in the basement of the insured building, and the necessity for another cask of water was thereby created, if there were openings in the partition of sufficient size to permit a cask to be easily rolled through, where water-casks were represented to be in each room, but were in fact only in each story. Daniels v. H. R. F. I. Co., 59 D. 192.

An insurance expert may be questioned by plaintiff concerning his examination of the insured building for the insurance company and the objects the building then contained, in an action on a policy, for the purpose of proving the existence of the objects described in the application, and of showing his relation to the parties, and his means of observation and recollection. Ib.

The opinion of experts on questions of art or science, to be admissible, must always be predicated upon and relate to the facts established by the proofs in the case. Champ v. Com., 74 D. 388.

An expert may not only testify to opinions, but also state general facts, which are the result of scientific knowledge or professional skill. Emerson v. Lowell Gaslight Co., 83 D. 621.

In an action on a policy of life insurance, the physician of the party insured cannot be asked whether, if he had known that the applicant for insurance habitually indulged in intoxicating drink, he would have regarded that practice as impairing his constitution; nor can the examining physician of the company be asked whether, if he had known at the time he made the examination of the applicant that he was in the habit of using intoxicating liquors to excess, he would have regarded his life healthy and the risk good. They may give their opinion on matters of science connected with their profession, but they cannot be permitted to state their views of the manner in which others would probably be influenced, if certain specified facts existed. Ross v. Amer. M. L. Ins. Co., 84 D. 280.

The form of questions to experts is not regulated by any exclusive formula. Any question is proper which will elicit their opinions as to matters of science or skill which are in controversy, and at the same time exclude their opinion as to the effect of the evidence in establishing controverted facts. But if it requires the witness to draw a conclusion of fact, it should be excluded. Hunt v. Lowell Gas Light Co., 85 D. 697.

A witness who testifies to the impaired condition of bolting-cloths at one point of time during the lease of a grist-mill, on the trial of an action for the breach of a covenant to repair, cannot be asked as to the effect of the impaired condition of the cloths upon the value of the flour manufactured in the mill during the lease, as he can speak only of the value of the flour manufactured at the time he examined the cloths. Cooks v. England, 92 D. 618.

Where the secretary of an insurance company testifies that neither he nor the company, so far as he knows, had notice of a subsequent insurance, he cannot be asked: "As the executive officer of the Eureka Insurance Company, would you have consented to an additional insurance in the Monongahela or other insurance company, and if not, why?" Eureka Ins. Co. v. Robinson etc., 94 D. 65.

In an action of damages for personal injuries by negligence, the plaintiff having at the defendant's request submitted to a physical examination by surgeons, — held, 1. That testimony that, judging from the examination, including what she said at the time, and her indications of suffering, the injury complained of existed, was admissible, although the witness swore he could discover no external evidence of it; 2. One of the surgeons, plaintiff's witness, having testified that from such examination he could not discover the injury complained of, was asked by plaintiff's counsel, under objection, whether it might not have existed without his being able to discover it, and answered that it was possible, but not probable, — held, no error. Qualife v. Chicago etc. R'y Co., 83 R. 821.

Where the evidence is voluminous or contradictory, it is error to permit an expert to give his opinion as to what "the facts as sworn to by the several witnesses indicate." Bennett v. State, 46 R. 26.

189. When facts on which opinion is based must be given. — Experts may give opinions, and those of physicians are received upon questions of professional skill, but they must state the facts upon which the opinions are based, and they must be weighed as other evidence, and are not conclusive. Chandler v. Barrett, 99 D. 701.

On the question of the sanity of a testatrix at the time of making her will, when physicians are asked whether, from the circumstances of the patient and the symptoms they observed, they could form an opinion as to her sanity, and if so, whether they concluded her mind was sound or unsound, they should in either case be required to state what the circumstances or symptoms were from which their conclusions were drawn. Hathorn v. King, 5 D. 106.

The opinions of physicians concerning the insanity of defendant in slander, but stating no facts on which such opinions are based, are not admissible in evidence. Dickinson v. Barber, 6 D. 58.

140. Hypothetical questions.* — Witnesses giving their opinion as to the capacity of a testator, founded on facts known to them, cannot on cross-examination be asked what their opinion would be on a different state of facts. Rambler v. Tryon, 10 D. 444.

Professional witnesses are not to judge of the truth of testimony upon which their opinions on a question of insanity are based. Com. v. Rogers, 41 D. 458.

A proper question to put to a medical expert, whose opinion is sought on a question of insanity, is to ask him, if the symptoms and indications, testified to by other witnesses, are proved to the satisfaction of the jury, whether in his opinion the party was insane, and what was the nature of his insanity; what state of mind the symptoms indicate, and what the witness would expect the party's conduct to be if the party would be in any supposed circumstances. Id.

A medical expert may give his opinion upon the facts of a case, hypothetically stated, but cannot be asked to state his opinion upon all the evidence given on a trial and heard by him. Luning v. State, 52 D. 153.

On the trial of an action on a policy of life insurance where the assured had committed suicide, a medical witness was asked, "Assuming that a person had that form of insanity which you denominate melancholia, and had committed suicide, would you attribute that suicide to the disease?" Held, that the question was improper, as calling for no information peculiarly within the knowledge of an expert, but for an inference which the jury were capable of drawing, if justified by the facts, without being influenced by the opinion of the witness. Van Zant v. Mut. Ben. Life Ins. Co., 14 R. 215.

In putting a hypothetical question to an expert the party may assume as proved all that the evidence tends to prove, although the court may not regard it as proved. Quinn v. Higgins, 53 R. 305.

An expert may be asked his opinion, based upon a particular portion, though not the whole, of the testimony, the truth of which is assumed. Yardley v. Cuthbertson, 56 R. 218.

* Hypothetical questions, when may be put to experts, see note, 53 R. 307-309.

141. Weight of expert testimony.—The weight of opinions of witnesses as evidence, when necessarily received, depends not so much on the number of the witnesses as upon their capacity and opportunities for information, the unprejudiced state of their minds, and the nature of the facts. Clark v. Fisher, 19 D. 402.

The opinion of a single witness that a grantor was too much intoxicated to transact business when he executed the deed, is not sufficient, of itself, to avoid the deed. Harbison v. Lemon, 23 D. 376.

Medical testimony should be given with great care and received with the utmost caution, and unless sustained by reasons drawn from facts, is entitled to little weight. Clark v. State, 40 D. 481.

Expert testimony is of no weight when the witnesses, whose opinions are taken, have no learning in the scientific principles of which they speak. Carr v. Northern Liberties, 78 D. 342.

Assumed facts upon which experts base their opinion must be established by proof, or their judgment will be worth nothing, and should not be weighed by the jury. Hovey v. Chase, 83 D. 514.

An opinion as to the state of a title is not conclusive of the party's rights in the premises. Winter v. Stock, 89 D. 57.

An instruction that while the jury should consider the opinions of medical experts in connection with all the other evidence, they were not bound to act thereon to the entire exclusion of other testimony, but should determine the question of sanity from all the evidence; and that such an opinion, "based upon a hypothesis" which is "wholly incorrectly assumed, or incorrect in its material facts to such an extent as to impair the value of the opinion, is of little or no weight,"—held, correct. Guetig v. State, 32 R. 99.

In an ordinary case it is error to instruct the jury that expert medical testimony should be received and weighed with caution. Atchison etc. R. R. Co. v. Thal, 49 R. 484.

TABLE OF CASES

Re-reported in the 160 Volumes of

AMERICAN DECISIONS

AND

AMERICAN REPORTS.

The arrangement of cases is as follows: Cases entitled "Appeal of," "Application of," "Case of," "Ex parte," "In matter of," "In re," "Petition of," will be found under the name of the party; "Will of," under name of decedent; "Borough of," "City of," "County of," "Town of," "Village of," are under the name of the county, town, etc. "Dee as rel.," "Don as dem.," etc., appear also under name of real party.

"Bank," "Insurance Co.," and "Railroad Co.," are arranged under the first important word of title, familiar names being in some cases duplicated.

Supplementary words, such as Executor, Administrator, have been omitted, or the cases arranged without reference to these words. Thus, "Jones' Executor v. Smith," will be found indexed as "Jones v. Smith."

Cases consisting of a single name, as "Brown's Case," "Williams' Petition," "Thompson, Ex parte," etc., precede the cases of the same name in which the names of both parties are given. Thus, "Brown's Case" precedes Brown v. Adams.

Roman letters [xlix] refer to volumes of American Decisions, and Arabic figures [49] to American Reports.
